and hardy men, they were long lived and were prominent and leading citizens. John Park, her uncle, was the first white child born in St. Louis. The family later moved to Indiana and there various members of them were under General Harrison's army and became famous Indian fighters. Our subject received his primary education in the common schools of Indiana and Iowa, whither he went with his parents by team in 1850. In 1858 he entered Cornell college and remained there until he had very nearly completed the full course. In 1860 he traveled via the Isthmus of Panama to California and two years later, came on to Lane county, Oregon. Shortly after landing in Lane county, he went to the Salmon river mines and then returned to Lane county. Until 1878 he was engaged in teaching school, then secured a band of sheep and drove them across the mountains to Central Oregon. The Paiute Indians being then on the war path, he had much trouble and encountered dangers, being accompanied by his family. Still they managed to escape the dangers without loss of life and Mr. Huston gave his attention to stock raising in Central Oregon until 1890, when he was elected surveyor of Crook county. In early life he had given his attention to civil engineering in which he is very proficient. Upon being elected to the office named, he moved with his family to Prineville, both for the purpose of attending to the duties of his office and to educate his children. For ten consecutive years he has served in the county and has done most of the civil engineering work in the county. In 1890 he lost heavily in the stock business but has made more since.

In 1866 Mr. Huston married Victoria Childers, who was born in Franklin county, Missouri on December 9, 1839, and crossed the plains to Oregon in 1852 with her parents, Thomas G. and Mary (Hinton) Childers, natives of Virginia. The mother's father, Colonel Clayton, was colonel of a regiment in the Mexican War. To Mr. and Mrs. Huston, the following named children have been born: Henry Y., a blacksmith in Baker county; Mrs. Maggie O'Neil, who graduated in the Prineville high school; Knox D., a stockman in Crook county; Wade H., a graduate of the Prineville high school who also taught school some in the county; Sarah E. Thomson; Jesse I., engaged in the government printing office in Manila.

Formerly Mr. Huston was a Democrat, but he has now allied himself with the Socialists. In addition to his work as a civil engineer, he has done considerable writing and is possessed of no mean ability in the literary line. It is of note that his father was contemporaneous with George D. Prentice and assisted in the compilation of the biography of Henry Clay.

Mr. Huston had one brother, Hon. Henry Clay Huston, who crossed the plains to Linn county, Oregon, in 1852 and was state senator from that county in 1866. He also served in the Rogue River wars and was orderly sergeant in Captain Keith's company. He was badly wounded in the battle of Big Meadows, and was a true blue soldier. Hon. Henry C. Huston was also well known for his literary ability, having been author of many bright gems. His death occurred on December 18, 1899.

S. J. NEWSOM, now one of the retired stockmen in Crook county, has the distinction of being one of the first pioneers here and the foremost man during the years since. He was born in Springfield, Illinois, on March 13, 1834. His father, David Newsom, was born in Green Brier county, Virginia, in 1808 and was an early pioneer of Oregon, crossing the plains in 1851. He was a noted temperance advocate and did much good work both in Oregon and Washington. His death occurred in 1880. He had married Mary Huston, who was born in Monroe county, West Virginia, in 1815. She came of Scotch-Irish ancestry, her grandfather being a native of Ireland and her grandmother of Scotland. Our subject remained in Springfield, Illinois, until seventeen years of age, then, it being 1851, came across the plains with his parents. They utilized ox teams for this journey and settlement was made in Marion county a few miles northeast of Salem, the father taking a donation claim. Our subject remained in that vicinity for twenty years, making several trips to the mines in the meantime. In 1863 he returned via the Isthmus to Kentucky, wintering in Illinois, and the next spring returned to Oregon, bringing stock with him to his western home. In 1868 he purchased a farm near the home place and dwelt there two years. Then he came to that portion of Wasco county now embraced in Crook county and selected a home on the creek which received his name, some thirty miles east from where Prineville now stands. He continued there until 1879, then removed to Prineville, where he has resided since. He took up stock raising when he first came here and continued actively at it until a few years ago, when he retired from business. He owns now more than twenty-five hundred acres of land in Crook county, one-half section of which is within the city limits of Prineville. Mr. Newsom has made a splendid success in the financial world and is looked up to as one of the leading men of the county.

On August 24, 1876, in Albany, Oregon, Mr. Newsom married Sarah J. Simpson, who was born in Linn county, Oregon, on January 7, 1853. Her father, Frank Simpson, was born in Frankfort, Kentucky, and there grew to manhood and married. Then he moved to Missouri, where his first wife died. Later he married Mary Ann Corum, a native of Clay county, Missouri. She is now living in Pomeroy, Washington. Mr. Simpson left Missouri in 1850 and came to Oregon, settling on a donation claim near Albany. In 1870 he moved to Lassen county, California, and there died in 1872. To Mr. and Mrs. Newsom the following named children have been born, John D., Gale S. and Samuel J. John D. was born March 8, 1899, and received his early education in Prineville, graduating from the public schools when eleven. Then he entered the state normal, graduating when he was eighteen years of age. Then he enlisted in Company C, from Lane county, responding to the first call for volunteers during the Spanish War. He went to the Philippine Islands with the Second Oregon Regiment and did duty there for fifteen months. He returned in 1899 and matriculated in the Portland law school from which he graduated on March 3, 1902. He is now deputy state mineral surveyor, under thirty thousand dollar bonds. Gale S. was born on September 7, 1881, and after completing the public schools in Eugene, Oregon, he attended the normal and also took a business course in Portland. In 1900 he entered the medical college and graduated in April, 1904, and is now practicing at Arlington, this state. Samuel J. was born June 5, 1889, and is now a student in the high school.

Mr. Newsom served in the Yakima and Cayuse Indian Wars and although two captains, a lieutenant, a mate and companion were killed and crippled near him and he had many close calls, still he was never injured. At one time during the campaign, he subsisted for twenty days on horse meat, they being obliged to kill the worn-out cayuses for this purpose. He waited forty-seven years before receiving his pension for this service but finally succeeded in getting it. In 1879 Mr. Newsom filled the unexpired term of A. H. Brehman, the county assessor, and then was elected assessor of Wasco county. At the creation of Crook county, he was appointed surveyor by the governor, being the first incumbent of that office, and while performing his duties, he was urged by the county court to bring in the assessment for Crook county. Owing to that, he resigned his duties as surveyor and became assessor. He filled this office with credit to himself and, as in every capacity, was a thorough and staunch business man. Politically, he is a Democrat and gives of the time and interest that is demanded in this realm.

LEANDER N. LIGGETT, the present deputy sheriff of Crook county, residing at Prineville, was born in Polk county, Oregon, on December 23, 1853. His father, Joseph Liggett, was born in Missouri and came with his father, our subject's grandfather, across the plains. Joseph Liggett settled on what is known as the Liggett donation claim near Lewisville, in the Willamette valley. He started to fight the Indians but being taken sick at Oregon City he was obliged to return. His death occurred at Yakima, Washington, in 1892. He married Anna E. Sleeth, a native of Indiana, who crossed the plains in 1852 and died on March 16, 1903. Our subject remained on the ranch with his father in Polk county until 1866, when the father was elected sheriff and the family removed to Dallas. There Leander entered school and later matriculated at Corvallis college, graduating from the complete course in 1873. Among his classmates was William F. Harrin, now a leading attorney. After leaving school, Mr. Liggett went to Linn county and taught school. In 1875 he had charge of running the level from Corvallis to Newport, on the first line that went through that country. Then he took a position in the office at Albany as bookkeeper and assistant manager of the business, continuing until 1880. In 1878, however, he was elected superintendent of schools for Linn county and served two years.

On February 6, 1878, Mr. Liggett married Catherine E. Cowan, and to them one child has been born, Florence Ethel, the date being December 6, 1879, and she is now deputy clerk of Crook county. In the fall of 1880, Mr. Liggett left the valley and came to Crook county, engaging in the stock business. In 1893 he moved to Prineville, taking the position as principal of the city schools, continuing in the same for three years. In October, 1895, he bought the Prineville Review, which he conducted until July, 1902, then sold to William Holder. For three terms Mr. Liggett was mayor of Prineville and was recorder one term. For many years he was chairman of the Democratic county central committee, and has always been very active in political affairs. He belongs to the A. O. U. W., the W. O. W. and the K. P. and is one of the representative men of this county.

On January 30, 1905, since the above was written, the sad event of the death of Mr. Liggett has been chronicled. Regarding it, one has said: "No death in recent years has come as such a sudden blow to the community, to the family, and to the many friends of the deceased. Few knew that Mr. Liggett was suffering from any bodily ailment. The death of Mr. Liggett marks the close of a lifelong career of usefulness and it is with a feeling of genuine sorrow and regret that the host of friends and acquaintances throughout the county and state see his remains laid to rest."

Mr. Liggett was a popular and beloved man, was a leader in many lines, had endeared himself to all by his sterling worth and principle, and in the midst of an active life, just when the prime of days had come to him, he stepped forth to the realities of another life. The entire community joined the intimate friends in extending sympathy to the bereaved widow and family.

WILLIAM H. FOSTER has been in Crook county nearly twenty years. During that time he has labored assiduously as a stockraiser and tiller of the soil and the result is that today he is one of the well to do men of the county, has a good standing, and is a representative man. He was born in Linn county, Oregon, on December 28, 1870, and resides at the present time some nine miles up Wolf creek. His father before him was a pioneer and his father's father, being known as hardy and brave frontiersmen who blazed the way for others to follow in many sections of the United States. William W. Foster, our subject's father, was born at Silverton, Oregon, and followed farming in the Willamette valley until 1893 in which year he came to Crook county, where he is still engaged in stockraising. His father, Henry Foster, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Missouri, crossing the plains to Oregon in 1846 and was the first white man married in what is now the state of Oregon. When coming to the west, this venerable pioneer was forced to transform his wagon boxes into boats and thus ferry his people and goods across the Mississippi river and the other intervening streams on the way to the west. The mother of our subject, Mary (Marks) Foster, was born in Linn county, Oregon, her people being among the first settlers in the state. William H. received his education in the Willamette valley and in 1887 came to Crook county, selected his present place, which is nine miles up Wolf creek from Paulina, and began stock raising. He purchased land until he owns four hundred and forty acres, which is well fitted for a good stock ranch. He has given his entire attention to the breeding of stock and has gained steadily in wealth as the years have gone by. He is a man of substantial and excellent qualities and has done his share to build up the country, and stands well today.

In 1897 Mr. Foster married Josephine Brown, a native of Crook county and the daughter of Charles Brown, who was born in Sweden and came as a pioneer to this county. Two children are the fruit of this union, Roy L. and Mildred.

GUYON SPRINGER is a representative citizen of Crook county and a leading stock breeder of this part of the state. He has shown exceptional ability in the lines he has pursued by the unbounded success he has achieved. He resides three miles southwest from Culver and has one of the choicest estates in this part of the country. It consists of eight hundred acres of splendid agricultural land, a large body of excellent timber and three thousand acres of grazing land. He has fine improvements and is a man who shows excellent taste and the best of judgment.

Guyon Springer was born in Polk county, Oregon, on March 8, 1854. George W. Springer, his father, was a native of Steuben county, New York, and February, 1827, was the time of his birth. He crossed the plains with his parents, the grandparents of our subject. He was a leader in the Christian church, and his father, Barney D. Springer, kept a hotel among the stumps on the ground where Portland now stands, and was a stanch church worker. The mother of our subject was Sarah A. Clark, a native of Ohio, and the daughter of Elder Israel L. Clark, the noted preacher of the Christian denomination. The common schools of Yamhill county, Oregon, gave the early training to our subject and then he completed in the Portland Business College. In 1876 he removed to Whitman county, Washington, and in company with his brother, Byron Springer, introduced the first Clydesdale horses, Jersey cattle and Poland China hogs in that part of the country. Also they handled fine poultry and were very progressive men in these lines of breeding fancy stock. In 1880 he returned to the valley and there resided until 1887 when he came to his present location, taking a homestead. The next spring he went east and purchased some fine thoroughbred horses which he brought back with him. Since then he has been handling thoroughbred stock and has fifty head of choice horses. They are Clydesdale, Standard Trotters, Cleveland Bays, and other kinds. He is the first man crossing the English Hackney and the Standard Trotters, and has made a good success in this breeding. Mr. Springer also handles blooded cattle and has some choice full bloods in poultry lines. Among these he has Barred Plymouth Rock, Black Langshan, Silver Wyandotte and others.

On December 15, 1883, Mr. Springer married Miss Nora Goucher, a native of Yamhill county, Oregon, and the daughter of Dr. G. W. Goucher, who was a minister and physician, and also an influential man in politics, having been in the legislature in California. Mrs. Springer has one brother, Dr. Goucher, a noted physician located at McMinnville, this state. Mr. and Mrs. Springer have two children, Melissa and George W., aged five and two respectively. Mr. Springer is a member of the A. O. U. W. and the Artisans. He is also a deacon in the Christian church and is past master of the Yamhill county grange. Politically Mr. Springer is a Democrat and has served this county as commissioner and is a member of the board of road viewers. In all his labors he has manifested that thrift, sagacity, and keen foresight that are so needful in winning success. He is recognized as one of the leading men of the country and has stimulated much worthy effort in the line of improvement and upbuilding. His thoroughbreds are among the finest to be found in this part of the country and his skill as a horseman is known far and near.

RICHARD W. BREESE, who lives twelve miles out from Prineville on the Burns road, has wrought out a success for himself here that is well worth the commendation of all lovers of industry and thrift. A detailed account of his life will be interesting and instructive and with pleasure we append the same. Richard W. Breese was born in Butler county, Ohio, on January 15, 1854. His father, John Breese, a native of England, came to America in 1850 and settled on a farm in Ohio. In 1856, he moved to Jennings county, Indiana, and in 1868, moved to Livingston county, Illinois. In 1880, we find him again journeying and this time to Linn county, Oregon. Four years later he left that country and came to Crook county and here he remained until his death. He was a very extensive farmer in the east and also operated here in the west. During the time of the Civil War, he was captain of the home guards in Indiana and assisted to repel Morgan at Madison, that state. He married Mary Rooke, a native of Scotland who came to America in 1850, their wedding occurring in Ohio. Mrs. Breese came from a prominent and well-to-do family. Sir George Rooke, the English admiral who had charge of the English and Dutch forces that captured Gibraltar in 1704, is the great-great-grandfather of Mr. Breese. Our subject was educated at home, being well trained in the ordinary English branches and accompanied his father on all of the journeys prior to 1876. In that year, he came to Linn county, Oregon, where he was engaged in farming and stock raising until 1889. That year he sought out a location in Crook county, taking a homestead near where he lives at present. Since that time, he has purchased land until he owns an estate of eleven hundred acres. During the past fifteen years, he has given his undivided attention to the improvement of his estate and to handling cattle, the result being that he has gained a large amount of first class property and is one of the leading citizens of Crook county.

In 1878, Mr. Breese married Miss Charlotte Gray, who was born in Linn county, Oregon, the daughter of John and Isabel (Rooke) Gray, natives of Kentucky and Scotland, respectively. Mr. Gray crossed the plains with ox teams in 1852 and took a donation claim in Linn county. He became one of the prominent citizens of the state and was a strong opponent to what was known as the Golden Circle, being more favorably inclined to the Union League. To Mr. and Mrs. Breese two children have been born, Mary and Ralph.

Like many of the most substantial men of our country, Mr. Breese started without any capital whatever except bright hopes, strong hands and an unlimited supply of courage and stability. He has won his way to his present prosperous condition by virtue of his own industry and sagacity and has always left an unsullied reputation. He has many friends, is well known and stands high.

MARCELL SENEAL, a native of Oregon, has passed his entire life in the territory embraced in this state. He is now residing four and one-half miles north from Suplee, in Crook county, where he follows stock raising and farming. Mr. Senecal was born in Marion county, on September 5, 1855. Dedron Senecal, his father, was a native of Canada, his birth place being near Montreal and he comes from French extraction. In early life he was associated with the Hudson's Bay Company and when young came on west to what is now Oregon. He was a trapper for that company for years and was all over Oregon before there were any settlers here. He finally took a donation claim on what is now French prairie in the Willamette valley, the point first settled in Oregon. There he remained until 1876 in which year he moved to Wasco county, which was his home until his death. His entire life was spent on the frontier and as a brave adventurer he was a decided success. He married Lucy Dushart, who was born in Marion county, Oregon. Her father also was one of the employes of the Hudson's Bay Company. Our subject remained in Marion county until he was eighteen years of age, when he came east of the mountains to Wasco county. He selected a ranch, married and lived there until 1900 in which year he came to his present location. He has a good farm and is doing well in farming and stock raising.

It was 1874, that Mr. Senecal married Mary Delore, a native of Marion county, Oregon. Her father, Peter Delore was also a pioneer of Oregon and married Lizzie Depree. Mr. and Mrs. Senecal have two children, George and Albert G.

J. H. GRAY, one of the leading and representative men of Crook county, devotes his attention to farming and stock raising. He resides twenty-four miles east from Prineville on the Burns stage road and has an estate there of nearly two thousand acres. When he first acquired the place, it was very much run down but by his thrift and wisdom, he has made it one of the richest ranches in Crook county. He handles a great many horses and cattle of the finest strains. He also breeds Poland China hogs. Among cattle, he pays the most attention to the Hereford stock and his thoroughbreds are among the finest to be found in this part of the state. Altogether, he is a very successful and wealthy stockman.

Among the ancestors and relatives of Mr. Gray, we will give a brief mention of the following. His great-great-grandfather, Mr. Jackson of Ireland, married Miss Horner, also a native of Ireland and to them was born Martha Jackson. James Gray married Martha Jackson in Ireland. He was born in 1725 and died in Kentucky. To this marriage were born the following named children: Nizzle, on September 3, 1745, who died in Pennsylvania, on June 3, 1767; Mary, on February 19, 1747, married David Cowan of Bourbon, Kentucky; Rachel, February 28, 1749, married Mr. Cowan in Pennsylvania; George, May 10, 1751, and died September 21, 1775, the date he was to be married; Gennett, August 20, 1753, died July 30, 1767; James, June 11, 1755, married Mary Caldwell in Pennsylvania and died at Bourbon, Kentucky; Elizabeth, November 5, 1757, married Joseph McEnulta and died at Nicholas, Kentucky, in 1804; Sarah, May 24, 1760 and married David McKinley;

William, on November 8, 1762, and married Miss Mary, last name lost; David, on January 18, 1767, married Nancy Mooney, in Kentucky, in 1792. Martha (Jackson) Gray, the mother of these above mentioned, was a cousin of General Jackson and lived to be one hundred and five years of age, her death occurring in Kentucky. To David Gray and Nancy (Mooney) Gray were born the following named children: Nancy Gray, on April 21, 1793; James, on January 27, 1797; Martha, on March 26, 1799; John, on December 19, 1802; William, on February 7, 1805; David, October 23, 1807; and Jane, in 1813. The first two of these seven children were born in Bourbon, Kentucky. The other five were born in Nicholas, Kentucky. Their father, David Gray, died in Preble county, Ohio, on November 23, 1840. His father died in Preble county, Ohio, on November 25, 1837. Of the seven children of David and Nancy (Mooney) Gray, we have record of the death of six: Nancy Gray died in Crawfordsville, Linn county, Oregon when ninety-four years of age; Martha, died in Preble county, Ohio, December 14, 1845; John, who is the father of the immediate subject of this sketch, died in Portland, Oregon in February, 1879—it is supposed that he was drugged and put out of a hotel at night; he was found on the street insensible and died a few hours after being taken to the hospital; William died in Preble county, Ohio, where he lived on the old home place of his parents from the time they came there from Kentucky until his death; David died at Albany, Oregon, and was buried on his donation claim beside his wife, Elizabeth, who had died many years previously, near Halsey, Oregon; Jane died in Nicholas, Kentucky in 1813, aged twenty-one years. Nancy (Mooney) Gray, the mother of these children named, is the grandmother of J. H. Gray, the subject of this sketch. Her father was Patrick Mooney and would be the great-grandfather of J. H. Gray. This venerable patriarch was born in 1681 and died December 14, 1799, being one hundred and eighteen years of age. He married Jane Beard of Ireland and to them were born in Virginia, United States, on March 1, 1768, Nancy Mooney. After the death of his first wife Patrick Mooney married a second time. This wedding occurred when he was one hundred years of age and his bride was eighteen years of age. They lived together eighteen years before his death. Patrick Mooney was a well educated and prominent man. He was born in the north of Ireland but came of Scotch ancestry. One time during his life, while on a pleasure voyage their ship was wrecked. He and two others were attacked by pirates and sold as slaves on the island. Later they succeeded in making their escape and came to America. The Gray family is related to the families of Presidents McKinley and Jackson.

J. H. Gray, who is the immediate subject of this sketch, was born in Linn county, Oregon, on April 23, 1855, the son of John and Isabel (Rook) Gray, natives of Kentucky and Scotland, respectively. The father came with his parents to Ohio when a boy, crossed the plains in 1852 with ox teams and located on a donation claim in Linn county, Oregon, and became a very prominent and well-to-do man. We have already mentioned concerning his death. His wife came to the United States when a young lady and accompanied him across the plains after their marriage. Our subject was educated in Linn county and there grew up and engaged in farming. In 1876, he came to Crook county and wrought for wages for two years, then went into a blacksmith shop at Prineville, completing the trade there. Later he bought land and also took government land. Finally he sold his property and in 1899, bought the estate where he is now located.

In 1875, Mr. Gray married Rebecca Hunsaker who was born in the Willamette valley and came to Crook county in early days. The children born to this union are O. C., a merchant at Prineville, and treasurer of Crook county; Bruce, also in the mercantile business in Prineville; Pearl, the wife of Mr. Rowell, a rancher in Crook county; and Roy, farming with his father. In 1896, Mr. Gray was appointed by Governor Lord a member of the state board of agriculture but owing to the fact that he had just been elected sheriff of Crook county, he was unable to accept. He filled that important office for two terms and county assessor one term, and was a very excellent official.

Mr. Gray is a member of the I. O. O. F., a prominent man and one of the leading citizens of central Oregon.

RALPH PORFILY was born beneath the perfect skies of Italy, Agnone being his native heath, and October 23, 1860, the date of this important event in his career. His parents, Francesci and Marie (Domenica) Porfily, were born in the same place as our subject and there remained until their death. The father followed farming and stock raising. Ralph received his early education in his native country and wrought on his father's farm until 1881, then he came to America. At first he secured employment of the railroad in Pennsylvania, whence later, he went to Texas and wrought in a stone quarry. In 1883, he took a trip on foot through old Mexico and had many and varied experiences and he soon discerned that the United States was the better place for a man of thrift and industry and accordingly he made his way back. In 1888 he worked in the California quick silver mines, and in 1889, located in Crook county, Oregon. He immediately secured work herding sheep and soon got a band for himself. Then he took government land and bought land where he is now located, some fourteen miles out from Prineville on the Burns stage road, and started in the business for himself. He made himself master of the sheep industry and farming and knew well how to make everything count. Success could but attend him and he rapidly gained property. He now has about fifteen hundred acres of land and a large amount of stock. All this has been the result of his own efforts here and Mr. Porfily is to be commended for what he has achieved. He is a good citizen and takes an active interest in politics and educational matters as becomes a man of this free country.

PETER DELORE, JR., one of the pioneers of Crook county, and a man well known in the days of the Indian wars, is residing about three miles north from Suplee, where he has a nice estate and a good band of stock. His birth occurred in Marion county, Oregon. His father, Peter Delore, was born at Lagrande, Oregon and was a son of one of the Hudson's Bay Company's employees. That gentleman was at Lagrande, Oregon, before any white people were there and also spent his life traveling for the Hudson's Bay people to all portions of the west, long before any settlers were here. Our subject's father finally settled in Marion county, Oregon, on a donation claim. There he remained until 1861, when he came to Wasco county, settling near Oak Grove. In 1884, he came to Crook county and is now living here, aged eighty-nine. He married Lucy Delore, who was born at Fort Colville, Washington. Her father also was in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company. Our subject came to Wasco county with his parents when a boy and secured his education there and in his native county previously. When the Modoc Indian war broke out, he was employed as a scout a portion of the time and did some excellent service. After the war, he went to Nevada and did ranching until 1889, when he came to his present location and here has been engaged in the stock business since. In 1897, Mr. Delore married Margaret Mosier.

It is worthy of note that in the Paiute Indian War, Mr. Delore was captain of the scouts and did much excellent service. Being thoroughly acquainted with the country, a man of fearlessness and keen to discern the acts of the enemy, he was enabled to direct the other scouts, which resulted in the success of the soldiers and volunteers in quelling the outbreak. On one occasion, Mr. Delore was sent with seven scouts in his command to the top of Steen Mountain, by General Forsythe. The purpose was to ascertain the whereabouts of the savages and their numbers. While on the mountain, they surprised a couple of warriors building signal fires. Upon demanding their surrender they fired and killed the horse Mr. Delore was riding. Then the scouts captured one of the redskins and the other escaped under a volley from the white men.

HORACE P. BELKNAP, M. D., has the distinction of having practiced medicine in Prineville longer than any other physician in the county. During these years he has demonstrated satisfactorily to an appreciative and discriminating public his ability as a physician and surgeon, his integrity as a man and his progressiveness and broadmindedness as a citizen. Being a native Oregonian Dr. Belknap has always spent his life beneath the stars of the Occident and became fast wedded to the great Webfoot State. A detailed account of his life will be very interesting to the citizens of this county and we accept with pleasure the privilege of submitting the same.

Horace P. Belknap was born in Monroe, Oregon, on April 5, 1856. Harley Belknap, his father, was born in Ohio in 1832. Eight years later he moved with his parents to Iowa and ten years after that came with them across the plains by ox teams to the Willamette valley. He took a donation claim and there resided until 1875, when he came to what is now Crook county, where he engaged in the stock business. He also was a carpenter and builder and followed that occupation jointly with stock raising and many of the best contractors in Prineville testify to his skill and ability in this line. He married Thirza Inman, who was born in Tennessee, in 1836, and came with her parents to Missouri when six years of age. In 1853 she accompanied her parents across the plains to Oregon. She and her husband are now living retired in California, having secured a generous competence of this world's goods through their industry and thrift.

Our subject was educated in the Willamette University and after graduating from that institution matriculated at Ann Arbor, Michigan, where he remained two years. Then he entered the amous Bellevue Medical College at New York and graduated thence with honors in 1886, having fully earned the title of Doctor of Medicine, which was bestowed upon him. The doctor came to Prineville and since that time has been steadily engaged in the practice of medicine. He is extensively known and has a large practice. I. L. KETCHUM, who resides about a mile and one half west from Prineville, has one of the beautiful places in this part of the state. He is one of the pioneers of Crook county and is also one its leading citizens. His birth occurred in Carlton county, New Brunswick, on November 30, 1830, his parents being John William and Sophia (Grant) Ketchum, both natives of King county New Brunswick. The father was born in 1788 and followed milling during his life. Our subject received his education and was reared in his native place and there began to work for himself, continuing until 1878. In that year he came to his present location and purchased a tract of school land. It was very barren and uninviting and Mr. Ketchum began at once to improve and among the first things he did was to secure a water right and dig a ditch for irrigation purposes. This made the desert bloom as the rose and he soon had one of the best estates to be found. He provided all improvements that could be desired, as fences, barns, outbuildings, orchard and so forth, and in addition planted a fine grove well laid out so that his grounds are very beautiful. Mr. Ketchum erected comfortable farm buildings and has taken great pride in beautifying and keeping his place in splendid order. These labors have all been very worthy, and are to be commended for others have been stimulated to greater effort by what he has accomplished.

In 1886 Mr. Ketchum married Sarah Dingee, who was born in Carlton county, New Brunswick, on March 22, 1849, the daughter of Charles D., a native of New Brunswick. To Mr. and Mrs. Ketchum the following named children have been born: Alwilda, the wife of Dr. Belknap; Fannie, the wife of Columbus Johnson; Jessie, married to Otto Grey; Emma, the wife of Henry Whitchet; Elizabeth and Randolph. Mr. Ketchum is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the A. O. U. W. He and his wife are substantial members of the Methodist church and are known as upright and good people.

T. F. BUCHANAN is to be numbered with Crook county's substantial stock men and farmers. He resides two and one-half miles northwest from Grizzly, where he owns three hundred and sixty acres of land. His stock consists mostly of cattle.

T. F. Buchanan was born in Henry county, Missouri, on October 5, 1856, the son of Elja Buchanan, a veteran of the Black Hawk War. In his native state our subject was educated and reared. When eighteen years of age, being possessed of an adventurous spirit, he determined to try the west and accordingly journeyed to California. He did farming and worked for wages for about six years. Then, it being 1880, he came to Grant county, Oregon, and engaged in freighting from The Dalles to Canyon City. Seven years were occupied at that arduous labor and then he came to Crook county. He secured a place near Prineville and there was engaged in farming until 1898, when he came to his present location and secured the estate mentioned above. Mr. Buchanan has been favored with good success and is one of the substantial men of this part of the county.

In 1890, Mr. Buchanan married Miss Hale and to them one child has been born, Nora. Mr. Buchanan is a member of the well known and prominent Buchanan family, one of whom was president of the United States in the fifties. Many members of the family have been distinguished people and are prominent in the professions.

JACOB STROUD is a genuine Oregonian. He was born in Benton county, this state, on March 8, 1849, and has passed his life within the boundaries of the state, showing, during the years intervening, his stability and his resourcefulness in the walks of life. His father, David D. Stroud, was born in Henderson county, Illinois, on April 23, 1812, and crossed the plains with ox teams in 1845. At The Dalles they had trouble with the Indians, but finally made their way down the river and then selected a place six miles north from where Corvallis now stands. May 11, 1846 was the date when settlement was made and there the family remained until 1874. Our subject was one of the first white children born in Benton county and he received his education in the common schools and in the agricultural college at Corvallis. Also, he spent some time in teaching in the college. Then he started out for himself. His father continued on the old place until the date last mentioned, when he removed to Butter creek, in Umatilla county and engaged in the sheep business until 1877. He died in Prineville in 1887. He had married Miss Susan Hawkins, a native of Kentucky, who crossed the plains with her husband and was one of the first white women in Benton county. She was a faithful helpmeet to her husband in his pioneer labors, and remained thus till her death in 1881. When our subject started for himself, he worked for wages until his marriage and then he settled down to farming in Benton county. After a few years at that, it being 1878, he turned his attention to handling sheep in Umatilla county. He was on Camas prairie at the time of the Indian outbreak and after taking his family to Umatilla Landing for the protection there afforded, he returned to round up his sheep and spent six weeks in the saddle. Then he returned to the valley and remained until 1885, in which year he came to the vicinity of Prineville and there engaged in stock raising until 1899. On March 1 of that year he came to his present location, two miles west from Lamonta, where he took a homestead and bought land so that with his son he now owns four hundred and forty acres. The estate is choice land and is well improved with fine house, barns, out buildings, and so forth. They also own a threshing outfit which they operate during the fall of each year.

In 1872, Mr. Stroud married Miss Mary M. Seales, who was born in Arkansas, on January 18, 1852, the daughter of Burrell Seales, a veteran of the Mexican War. Mr. Stroud has the following named brothers: William, in Idaho; John, in Josephine county; Zechariah and Henry, in Prineville; David, at The Dalles; Isaac, in King valley, Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Stroud have two children, J. F. and Mrs. Ella V. Rodman. Mr. Stroud is a member of the A. O. U. W. and holds with the Democratic party. He and his wife both belong to the Baptist church and are good people.

W. T. WOOD. Without doubt the subject of this article is to be classed as one of the most successful pioneers of central Oregon. While he has not been within the presincts of the state so long as some, still he is one of the pathfinders of Crook county and his labors have resulted in very much good for the development of the country. To give a detailed account of his career would occupy more space than we are permitted to use but a succinct statement of the same would be very interesting and instructive to all.

W. T. Wood was born in Illinois, on December 29, 1830, the son of Milo and Elizabeth Ann (Telford) Wood, natives of North Carolina and Tennessee respectively. The father was born in 1795. He was a veteran of the War of 1812 and died in Illinois, in 1870. The mother was born in 1795 and died in Illinois, in 1875. Our subject completed his education in the Presbyterian school at Jacksonville, Illinois, and remained on the farm with his father until eighteen years of age. Then the family came to Petersburg, Illinois, where he continued until twenty-three years of age. Then he went to Nebraska, where he was variously engaged for a time. Mr. Wood distinctly remembers being on the grounds now occupied by the great city of Omaha when the first platting was done and he was offered a plat of sixty lots for the horse he was riding but refused to make the trade. These lots now are in the heart of the city. He owned a ranch at that time of one section of land on the Platte river, where he was engaged in farming. He also, later, freighted from Omaha to Denver. During that time the buffalo were very plentiful on the plains and also it was when William F. Cody was riding the pony express and gained notoriety and the soubriquet of "Buffalo Bill" by shooting a large number of these roamers of the plains. In 1863, our subject went to California and engaged in farming for nine years. It was 1872, when he landed in the Willamette valley, where he was occupied for eight years. Then he came to his present location, which is Ashwood. This was a very fine country so Mr. Wood was induced to take up stock raising. He handled both cattle and sheep and his farm home is the place where Ashwood now stands. While he was engaged in the sheep industry, he handled bands of about six thousand all the time and was very successful in the business. About 1884, while Mr. Wood was digging a well, he discovered iron sulphate which led him to make further search and he soon discovered other unmistakable evidences of an ore body. He at once went to work to organize a company to develop the properties and was one of the leading spirits in opening the Ashwood mines. He is largely interested in that at the present time, owning a heavy amount of stock in two companies.

Mr. Wood is still handling stock and doing general farming in addition to his mining interests, and has disposed of his sheep, confining his operations to cattle. He is well known throughout the country and is esteemed as a man of ability and integrity.

In 1861, while in Nebraska, Mr. Wood married Martha J. Rush, who was born in Ohio, on October 27, 1847. Her father, Isaac Rush, was a sheepman in Ohio and Nebraska. To this union, three children have been born, James, Milo and Lee.

JAMES WOOD, the postmaster at Ashwood, who is also one of the early pioneers of Crook county, is to be mentioned as a leading citizen and a staunch business man. He is now occupied in mining and stock raising. His birth occurred in Nebraska, on May 22, 1862. His father, W. T. Wood, is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Our subject was taken by the family from Nebraska to California when quite young. In 1875, they journeyed on to the Willamette valley and then he came to Ashwood. In 1880, he took a band of stock east and has driven cattle across the plains. He engaged in sheep and cattle raising, in 1886, and still continues handling cattle. In his labors, he has gained a good success, having displayed both energy and skill. In 1889, he began to work on the Red Jacket mines, which are now owned by the Red Jacket Mining Company and since that time, has been more or less engaged with mining. He discovered the Dexter and Red Jacket mines and has spent a good many thousand dollars in developing these properties. At present, he is general manager of the properties mentioned. On the Oregon King they have a large quantity of ore blocked out. In addition to this, Mr. Wood owns a half interest in the Ashwood mines and owing to his industry and push, the mining interests of this section have been brought to the notice of the public and steps are being taken to make producers of these properties. In the spring of 1899, Mr. Wood laid out the townsite of Ashwood and still owns the principal portion of the same. At the establishment of the Ashwood postoffice, he was appointed postmaster and has held the office since to satisfaction of all.

On March 8, 1902, Mr. Wood married Ada Belle Rush, the daughter of Samuel Rush, who is mentioned in another portion of this work. Two children have been born to this union, Floyd and Bessie.

Mr. Wood is a member of the Masons and in politics, he is a Republican. He is looked up to and respected by all and readily holds this position, owing to his sagacity and his staunch principles.

CHARLES BOLSBY who was born in Denver, Colorado, on September 22, 1862, is now one of the substantial agriculturists of Crook county and resides in Suplee. His father was John K. Bolsby, a native of Ireland. When a young man he came to America and settled at Soda Springs, Colorado. By trade he was a cooper and baker and followed these occupations in Colorado. He fought in all the early Indian wars in that part of the country, and became a very prominent and leading man. He married Sophia Streeter of Scotch nativity who came to America when a young girl and the wedding occurred in Wisconsin. Our subject accompanied his parents from Colorado to Wisconsin when a mere boy and from that state, they journeyed later to Missouri. After that, they lived in Kansas and in 1876, Charles came on to the Willamette valley. His education was completed in the university at Eugene, Oregon, and following that he held the position of brakeman on the Oregon and California railroad for a number of years. Finally, in 1884, he came to Prineville, Oregon, and went into the stock business. That occupation has held him since and he has been quite successful in prosecuting the same. His ranch consists of six hundred acres of good land and at this time he is giving his attention to tilling the soil in addition to raising some stock. The place is well improved and Mr. Bolsby is planning more extensive additions and improvements to his estate in the near future.

Mr. Bolsby married Lily Delore, who was born at Dufur, Oregon, and died January 25, 1892. The household has been blessed by two children, Edith and Iva P. Mr. and Mrs. Bolsby enjoyed the esteem and confidence of all.

JOSEPH H. DEEN, a native Oregonian, resides two and one-half miles north from Suplee. The date and place of his birth was Wasco county, January 27, 1871. Jacob Deen, his father, was born in Missouri and crossed the plains in 1847, to where Portland now stands. For five years he remained there, then came to Wasco county and took government land and engaged in farming and stock raising. He continued the same until 1880 in which year he removed to Lewiston, Idaho. Four years were spent there and he returned to Wasco county, where he remained until 1905. He had fought in the Rogue River, Modoc and the Paiute Indian Wars and showed bravery and faithfulness in these trying and dangerous times. He married Frances Kingston, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains with her parents to Oregon in 1848. Our subject was educated and reared in Wasco county and in 1893 came to his present location and took a homestead. He engaged in farming and stock raising and has continued the same ever since, with reasonable success.

In 1899, Mr. Deen married Miss Bertha Bush, who was born in Missouri and they now have two children, Velva and Lowel. Mrs. Deen's father, James F. Bush, was born in Missouri and became a well-to-do farmer. He married Sirena Thompson, a native of Putnam county, Indiana. She was brought to Missouri by her parents when three years of age and in 1847 came with them across the plains to the Willamette valley. The father took a donation claim near Salem and in 1852 removed to Portland. From thence they journeyed to San Francisco and started for Cuba by ship, but instead of stopping there they went on to New York then to Pennsylvania and finally back to Missouri. There Mrs. Bush remained until 1897, when they came back to Oregon. She was a pioneer in the true sense of the word and always lived on the frontier and never saw a cook stove until after she was sixteen years of age.

JOHN W. GILCHRIST is one of the progressive stockmen and farmers of Crook county and is to be numbered with the pioneers of central Oregon. His birth occurred in Indiana, on October 23, 1856 and he now resides twenty miles out from Post, on the Burns stage road. His parents, James and Charity M. (Adams) Gilchrist, were born in Scotland and Indiana, respectively. The father came to Indiana in pioneer days and was a very prominent Presbyterian minister. The mother journeyed to California in 1875, where she remained until 1880 when she returned to Indiana and there died in 1893. Our subject was educated in Indiana and at the age of seventeen came west, stopping first amid the attractions of the Golden State. There he remained until 1877, when he journeyed on to the Willamette valley and one year later left that country for western Oregon. He has traveled over a large portion of the country east of the Cascades and south of the Columbia and finally located at the place where he now resides. From the beginning, he has been engaged in raising stock and now also does considerable farming in addition thereto. The success that has crowned his efforts has made him one of the well-to-do men of the county and he is considered a very substantial man.

In 1879, Mr. Gilchrist married Nellie Parish, who was born in the Willamette valley, the daughter of Edward Parish. Five children are the fruit of this union, Fred, Jamie, Floyd, Paul, and Willda. Mr. Gilchrist by experience knows well the hardships and arduous labors of the pioneer's life and he has done his share in opening this country for the ingress of civilization. Therefore it is with pleasure that his name is to be added to the list of worthy pioneers of this part of Oregon.

GEORGE H. OSBORNE, who is one of the representative agriculturists of Crook county, is residing at Culver, where he has a good estate. He was born in Missouri, in 1852. His father, Hon. William F. Osborne, is a native of Indiana, and was one of the first commissioners of Greenwood county, Kansas, and also enjoyed the distinction of being sent three times to the legislature of that state. He is a man of influence and ability and has had an interesting career. He made a trip to California at the time of the discovery of gold there and then returned to his home in Greenwood county where he resides at the present time. He married Mary Barnes, who was born in Missouri, and whose death occurred in 1864. Our subject was taken by his parents to Greenwood county, Kansas territory, from Missouri, they being among the earliest settlers of that territory. In 1872 our subject came from Kansas, where he had received his education, and located near Goose Lake, in Oregon. Three years later he removed thence to the Willamette valley and there remained until 1878, when he came to his present location and took a homestead. He also took a timber culture and since then he has devoted his energies to farming, and has made a good success.

On November 6, 1877, Mr. Osborne married Miss Ella Rogers, and they have become the parents of ten children, whose names follow: Franklin C., Robert C., Francis E., Maude L., Lulu M., Winford C., Floyd H., Lois W., Florence G., and Rex R. Mr. Osborne is a member of the A. O. U. W. and the Artisans and is to be numbered with the pioneers of the Haystack country. He has shown commendable industry in his labors and has a good standing in the community.

LEE WOOD, who resides at Ashwood, Oregon, was born in Lake county, California, on April 15, 1869. His father, W. T. Wood, is mentioned in another portion of this work. Mr. Wood is one of the stirring young business men of the county, possessing marked industry and integrity. He came from California to Lane county, Oregon, with his parents when but two years of age. The beginning of his education was gained in the Lane county home and in 1879, the family came thence to what is now Crook county. Here our subject was reared and completed his education and has been more or less connected with stock raising ever since the father settled here. It is interesting to note that where the shaft of the Oregon King is now located, Mr. Wood herded sheep for years, not knowing there were such valuable bodies of ore underneath. He is now largely interested in mining as well as stock raising and bids fair to become one of the wealthy men of this part of the country.

In the fall of 1901, Mr. Wood married Lena B. Robinson, the daughter of J. W. Robinson, an account of whose life is found elsewhere in this volume. Mr. and Mrs. Wood are young people of excellent standing, are favorites in society and are to be commended for their energy displayed in the good work of developing this country.

C. C. O'NEIL, a merchant, residing at Forrest, which is thirteen miles west of Prineville, is a man whose labors have accomplished very much for the development and upbuilding of Crook county. He was born in Connersville, Indiana, on August 27, 1857, the son of William G. O'Neil, who was born in Tennessee, in 1812 and was one of the pioneers to Indiana. Our subject was educated and reared in Indiana until 1870 when he went to Kansas and spent three years. Then came the journey to California where he settled on a fruit ranch in Sonoma county. For nine years he was occupied there and then he came to the Bend, Oregon, in 1882. One winter was spent there and after that Mr. O'Neil engaged in the stock business in this county. In 1890, he took charge of the Prineville Land and Live Stock Company and continued in the management of the same until 1889. During that time, he was instrumental in forwarding many things that were for the advancement of the county. He has always taken a deep interest in bringing Crook county to the front and developing her resources to make them productive. In this line, Mr. O'Neil has been a real leader and deserves much credit. In 1904, he severed his relations with the company above mentioned and came to his present location, purchased twenty-six hundred acres of land, one-half of which is agricultural. He also purchased the store at this point and enlarged it, putting in a fine stock of general merchandise. He is in partnership with his brothers, George W. and Walter in the business and the firm is known as a very progressive and up-to-date business house. Mr. O'Neil also buys and sells hay and grain and operates a general supply depot for this part of the country. In 1894, Mr. O'Neil married Mary Clarke, who was born in Iowa. Mrs. O'Neil died, leaving three children, Annie, William and Bercia.

Mr. O'Neil is a member of the W. W. and the A. O. U. W. In politics he is a Republican and is always on hand during the campaigns pushing forward the interests of his party.

His birth occurred in Montgomery county, Kansas, on January 13, 1878, being the son of R. N. and Mary King, natives of Kentucky and Indiana, respectively. The father settled in Indiana in pioneer days and later came to Kansas where he died when our subject was nine years of age. Then Samuel F. left home and began life for himself. Although very young, he was enabled to make his own way and for four years did so in Kansas. Then, being thirteen years of age, he came on to the Willamette valley and wrought there until 1897. At that time he came to eastern Oregon and worked in Wheeler county for wages. He also wrought in various other portions of the state and being of an economical and thrifty turn of mind, he saved his wages and in 1902 was enabled to purchase a half section of fine agricultural land, where he now resides. Mr. King is still a very young man and the fact that he has secured a farm of one-half section which is being improved and placed in a high state of cultivation, indicates the manner of man and his business ability. LEE STEERS is a pioneer of central Oregon and has done a splendid work both as such and as a stockman and farmer in later years here. He was born in Lincoln county, Illinois, on July 23, 1863, and now lives at Suplee in Crook county. James F. M. Steers, his father, crossed the plains from Illinois in 1865 to the Willamette valley. He drove four oxen and his wife drove four horses and thus they made their way

He was born in Biasca, Canton of Ticino, Switzerland, on July 15, 1844. His father, Santino Vanina, was born in the same place as our subject and there owned a small farm. In addition to operating that, he did logging in the mountains. In 1854 he went to Australia and did mining for about ten years. Then he returned to Switzerland and remained there until his death. He married Veronica Vanza, who was born in Osogna, Switzerland, and remained in Switzerland until her death. Our subject left home when twelve years of age and went to Australia. He spent seventeen years in that country and New Zealand and mined in all the leading camps of those great countries. While operating in the mines he learned to read and write the Italian language from a friend. His other educational qualifications have been gained in the same way by personal effort without much assistance from the schools. Finally, in 1872, he left the Southern Pacific ocean and returned to his native land, making a short visit to the home place. He then set out for California, whence he journeyed on to Nevada. Then he took a trip to Alaska after which he returned to California and engaged in the dairying business for five years. In 1882 Mr. Vanina came to The Dalles and engaged in ranching in that vicinity for two years. He now owns a large estate of eleven hundred and sixty acres and handles a great many cattle. He is considered one of the wealthy men of Crook county and has gained every bit of it by his own efforts as he started in life without any capital whatever. In 1878 Mr. Vanina married Catarina Rivera, who was born in the same place as our subject. She came to California in 1877 and was married in that state. Mr. and Mrs. Vanina have one child, Mrs. Lena Lowery. She and her husband are operating a farm in Crook county. Mr. Vanina has traveled very extensively and has seen great hardships and trying labors during his life. He has been in some very dangerous places but has always succeeded in making his way out and although he did not meet with the best of success in his many enterprises, nevertheless he is now one of the wealthy men of the country.

MARCUS J. WILT is a representative man of the country where he resides, and stands at the head of a good business. He is following merchandising in Sisters, and shows an ability and integrity that commend him to all who know him. He was born in Pennsylvania, on August 19, 1854. His father, Andrew Wilt, was also born in that state and enlisted in the Second Iowa cavalry, in 1861, being one of those who pressed forward at the first call. He saw hard service and died in the field hospital from the effects of it. Our subject left Pennsylvania with his parents when two years of age and they settled in Iowa. There Marcus received his education and remained until he had grown to manhood. When twenty-one he went to Leavenworth and there worked for wages for eight years. After that he came on west to Squaw creek and there took a homestead and engaged in raising cattle. He began with small means and has labored steadily along since that time, receiving the due reward of industry and wisdom. Later he entered into partnership with Mr. Smith and they opened a general merchandise establishment which is being conducted successfully at this time. Mr. Wilt also retains his ranch which is rented, while he in person attends to his store.

In 1879 Mr. Wilt married Miss Creamer, who was born in Missouri. Her father, Joseph Creamer, was a native of Georgia. Mr. Wilt has two brothers, John and George. He is a member of the A. O. U. W. and stands well in this community. He has labored faithfully and has accomplished good results. In business he is upright, accommodating, and careful of the interests of his customers. The result is that he has won the esteem of all and is worthy of the same.

HIRAM GIBSON, one of the representative stockmen and farmers of Crook county, resides about thirty miles southeast from Crook on the head of Crooked river, his place being known as the Cold Springs ranch. He was born in Meigs county, Tennessee, on March 18, 1853, the son of Randolph and Sarah (Brady) Gibson, natives of Kentucky and Tennessee, respectively. The father came to Tennessee in an early day and settled on a farm in Meigs county. After a number of years, he removed thence to Texas and there remained until his death. His wife's father resided on the Tennessee river and there did farming and operated a ferry. Our subject received a little education in Tennessee but owing to the fact that the schools were broken by the war then in progress he was not enabled to pursue his studies very much. When twenty years of age he journeyed to California where he worked for wages for a time. Later, he went to ranching for himself in Tulare county and in 1878 he came with his family to Polk county, Oregon. The next fall he located at The Dalles and took up sheep raising which he followed for years. It was 1885 when Mr. Gibson came to Prineville and engaged in the stock business in Crook county. He finally selected his present place in 1891 and purchased it. Since that he has made this his headquarters, has improved the farm and is raising stock. He is one of the enterprising citizens of the county and always displays a lively interest in its upbuilding and improvement.

In 1875 Mr. Gibson married Margarete R. King, who was born in Arkansas and went with her parents, William and Rhoda (Enloe) King, to California when a small child, where she was reared. The parents took this trip from Missouri in 1859. To Mr. and Mrs. Gibson, four children have been born, Randolph, Mrs. Mary Hutton, Abbie, and William H. Mr. Gibson has been prospered in his labors here in Crook county and has become one of the well to do men. He has a good standing, is widely known and has many friends.

JAMES S. McMEEN is a stock raiser and farmer residing three miles northwest from Lamonta. He was born in Ohio on February 25, 1852. His father, John McMeen, was born in Pennsylvania and was a veteran of the Civil War, having enlisted in Company J, Thirty-seventh Ohio Cavalry, in which he served until 1863, when he was thrown from his horse in Louisville, Kentucky, from the effects of which he died that same year. Our subject was educated in the common schools of Ohio and remained on the old home place until twenty-one years of age. Then he went to Philadelphia, later visited Chicago and then went back to the old home place in Ohio from which he started on September 8, 1883, for the west. He came direct to his present location and took a homestead. At that time, he had a capital of one hundred dollars. He began raising sheep and horses and has continued in that business together with farming. He is increasing his property holdings so that he now owns eight hundred and eighty acres which is well improved and productive. He has a beautiful home, one hundred head of cattle and other property.

In November, 1884, Mr. McMeen married Emma F. Williams, a native of Illinois and the daughter of William Williams. Three children are the fruit of this union, Charles, Lloyd and Bruce. Our subject has one brother, David, in Ohio.

Fraternally, he is a member of the W. W. and is a man well known as substantial and industrious.

ALEX SMITH, a prosperous merchant of Sisters, Crook county, was born in New Brunswick, Canada, August 16, 1869. His father, John B. Smith, was one of the first settlers of a portion of New Brunswick, where he plunged into the dense timber and succeeded in clearing a fine and productive farm of three hundred and twenty acres.

At the age of fourteen years our subject left New Brunswick and journeyed to Boston, Massachusetts, where he remained two years in the "Hub of the Universe," as the city has been felicitously called from time immemorial. It was in 1886 that he came to Grass Valley, Sherman county, Oregon, of which locality he was one of the earliest settlers, as it might be said; a pioneer of pioneers. Here, for a period of twelve years Mr. Smith was engaged in the industry of raising sheep. He then disposed of his holdings in this business and came to the town of Sisters where he at once engaged in the mercantile business, in which he has been quite successful, and which he still profitably continues.

Mr. Smith is, fraternally, a member of the I. O. O. F., and the A. O. U. W. He has made a success of every undertaking in which he has engaged since coming west, and has excellent reason to be proud of his present prosperity. He numbers many friends in the community in which he resides and has won the confidence of his fellow citizens by upright business dealings and strict probity.

S. S. BROWN resides one mile east from Haystack in Crook county, where he has a choice estate of four hundred acres. He gives his entire attention to general farming and has made a good showing in that line. His place has good improvements and he raises sufficient stock to handle the estate.

S. S. Brown was born in eastern Tennessee, in 1844. His father, J. B. Brown, was a native of North Carolina and was a veteran of the Revolution. The mother of our subject was Sarah (McNeil) Brown, also a native of North Carolina. In his native state, Mr. Brown received his early education and at the breaking out of the Civil War, belonged to Company A, of the Tennessee Militia. His company and Company B were retained in the service by General Burnside and they spent some time in active service. In 1864, Mr. Brown removed to Kentucky and a few years later, went thence to Kansas, where he was engaged in farming for about eleven years. In 1876, he came on west to Linn county, Oregon, and did farming there for three years. Then, in 1879, he came to this side of the mountains and settled on Willow creek in Crook county. That was his home for eleven years and then he sold out and came to his present location, purchasing four hundred acres, which is his farm today. Mr. Brown has always shown himself a man of industry and thrift, laboring faithfully and steadily to bring about the best results in his entire business enterprises and to build up the country.

In 1861 Mr. Brown married Miss Ross, a native of Tennessee. Mr. Brown has the following named children: Mary Jane, James A., John B., Warren, Ella, Maude, Lulu, Vesta, Roy, Fred, and Thelma.

Fraternally, our subject belongs to the I. O. O. F. and the A. O. U. W., while in political matters, he is allied with the Democratic party.

G. S. MILLER, an industrious and substantial farmer of Crook county, resides one and one-half miles southwest from Lamonta. He was born in Illinois, on March 1, 1837, the son of George Miller, who was a pioneer all his life. He always lived so far out on the frontier that he was away from railroad all his days. John Miller, the paternal grandfather of our subject, was a patriot of the Revolution. Our subject received his education in his native country and in 1850 crossed the plains on horseback, driving cattle all the way. They chose a location in Linn county and at once set about stock raising and general farming, clearing their land for that purpose. Soon after landing in Linn county, however, our subject began to travel to different portions of the west and he has been engaged in the stock business in various localities all the time since. He has done much riding on the range and has experienced every phase of frontier and pioneer life. About five years since, Mr. Miller came to his present location and took a homestead, which has been the scene of his labors since. He also owns a ranch in Lincoln county, Washington, and has some other property.

In January, 1861, Mr. Miller married Miss Walton, who was born in Ohio and crossed the plains in 1851. Her father, Ralph Walton, was a pioneer of the Pacific coast and has recently died. His widow is still living in this county. To Mr. and Mrs. Miller five children have been born, F. D., A. C., George M., Eva M., and Estella.

Mr. Miller always takes an interest in political matters and has labored faithfully in many portions of the west to build up and develop the country. He is now passing his golden years in this favored region and has the esteem of those who know him.

MARCUS D. POWELL, one of the prosperous ranchers of Crook county, and one well and favorably known in the community in which he resides, was born in Linn county, Oregon, November 21, 1853.

His father, John Powell, a native of Tennessee, crossed the plains from Missouri in 1852. He was a prominent worker in the theological field, and assisted in founding the Baptist church at Prineville. His father, Joab Powell, was a famous preacher in Oregon, Washington and California.

The early education of our subject was received in Linn county. When seventeen years of age, in 1870, he came to Prineville, where, in those pioneer days of roughing it, there were no public schools. But a short time after his arrival the people of the vicinity organized a subscription school, securing as teacher Mr. S. R. Slayton. This educational institution our subject attended and made the most of the slender opportunities offered, and here he received the greater part of his education. On attaining his majority he took a band of cattle on shares and began ranching on Beaver creek, where he remained about three years. Subsequently he engaged for a short time in the mercantile business, but again went on a farm where he continued six years. Then for six years afterward Mr. Powell was in the grocery business in Prineville, and on disposing of his interests in this enterprise he came to his present location, which is called the "Hay Ranch." This year Mr. Powell stacked between six hundred and seven hundred tons of hay. His ranch at present consists of four hundred acres—in this body—and four hundred and eighty acres in other parts of the county.

In 1880 our subject was married to Victoria Thompson, a native of Linn county. She died in 1893. Her father was Amos Thompson. In 1894 Mr. Powell was united in marriage to Mrs. Gerow Zevely, born in Linn county. She is the daughter of John M. Zevely. Their living children are Elizabeth and Lloyd. Ora, Marcus and Becky are deceased.

Politically Mr. Powell is a Republican, and was the first assessor elected in Crook county. For the past two years he has served as county commissioner, and during his official career as commissioner there have been a number of valuable improvements made in the county. Fraternally he is a member of the A. O. U. W.

EDMUND A. PARKER, a native of Oregon, having been born in Clackamas county, on February 29, 1864, is now an enterprising and successful stockman and farmer of Crook county, residing sixteen miles south of Prineville. His parents, Edmund A. and Sara E. (Bell) Parker, were born in Missouri and Kentucky, respectively, and crossed the plains with ox teams in 1850. The father took a donation claim on Rock creek and later moved to Oregon City, where his father-in-law, A. H. Bell, operated a drug store for a number of years. His death occurred in Albany, in 1902. Our subject was educated in the public schools of the various places where the family lived when he was of school age and in 1885 he came across the mountains to Crook county. He soon secured employment, as he arrived here without capital and worked steadily until he finally decided to take land. Then he went into the stockbusiness for himself. Later he entered into partnership and he and his partner today own a large ranch and a great many cattle.

In 1895 Mr. Parker married Gertrude Richards, who was born in Illinois and came to Oregon when young. Some five years since, he was called to mourn the death of his wife, who left one child, George.

Mr. Parker has achieved splendid success in his labors in this county and is always known as a public minded and progressive man.

WILLIAM H. MILLIORN has been a citizen of Crook county for a long time and is numbered with the progressive and leading men of this part of Oregon today. He was born in Monroe county, Tennessee, on June 20, 1835. John Milliorn, his father, was a native of Virginia and moved to Tennessee when a young man. He crossed the plains with ox teams in very early day to Lane county, Oregon, taking a donation claim where he remained until his death. He became a wealthy and very prominent citizen in this state. He descended from Pennsylvania Dutch ancestors and married Mary W. Lee, a cousin of Robert E. Lee, who was born in Virginia and crossed the plains with her husband. She came from a very prominent and well known family. Our subject was a boy when he accompanied his parents across the plains, yet he drove five yoke of cattle and became very expert in this business. Leaving the states when he was young and coming to a pioneer country where no schools existed he had a very poor chance of gaining an education but made the best of what he had. In 1855 he went to the Rogue river country and participated in the Rogue River War, being under General Wool. After that the family were in Lane county for a number of years and in 1880, came east of the Cascades. He located his present place very soon, which is known as Crook postoffice. Here he has remained for nearly twenty-five years, engaged in the dual occupation of farming and stock raising. Owing to the skill he has displayed and the industry, he has made a splendid success and is one of the well to do men of the country.

In 1859 Mr. Milliorn married Sarah J. Lemley, who was born near Little Rock, Arkansas, on September 16, 1844, the daughter of P. G. and Nancy (Fletcher) Lemley, natives of Arkansas. In 1853, Mr. Lemley brought his family across the plains with ox teams to Lane county and there he became a very prominent man and for years was clerk and judge of Lane county. Mrs. Milliorn was reared and educated in Lane county and came to Crook county with her husband. For nineteen years past, she has been postmistress at Crook and is a very efficient and popular incumbent. To Mr. and Mrs. Milliorn the following named children have been born, Thomas H., Mrs. Maude Logan, Mrs. Lucy Long, P. G., George D., John, and Mrs. Jennie E. Mulholland. Mr. Milliorn has the distinction of being one of the earliest settlers in this portion of the county and for years he labored here when neighbors were scattering and few and in the good work of opening up the country, he has done a commendable part. The adversity and hardship incident to pioneer life have been experienced by him in no small degree and he is rightly classed as one of the builders of the country.

CHARLES LINCOLN REAM, one of Crook county's substantial farmers and stock raisers, resides on Crooked river thirty-three miles southeast of Prineville on the Burns stage road. He there owns two hundred and forty acres of finely irrigated land which produces abundant crops and is well improved by substantial buildings and all things necessary for the operation of the place. He also owns a quarter section a few miles from this home place.

Charles L. Ream was born in Des Moines county, Iowa. His education was obtained in the public schools of his native state and he remained with his parents until he had arrived at his majority, when he began life for himself. His father, Enoch Ream, a native of Pennsylvania, was a brickmaker by trade and followed this occupation in various sections of the country. When yet a young man, he came to Iowa and there married Miss Frances Dowell, a native of Indiana. Her parents had moved to Iowa when she was a young girl. Mr. and Mrs. Ream crossed the plains to the Willamette valley, making settlement near Eugene where he followed his trade. They were the parents of nine children, namely: Harriett Wells and Henry, of Eugene, Oregon; Edward, in California; Mrs. Mathilda Montgomery, in Iowa; Charles L., who is our subject; Enoch, Adam, Fred, and Gus, all in Oregon.

In 1873 occurred the marriage of Charles L. Ream and Miss Ida M. Dowell, the latter being a native of Illinois, in which state the wedding was celebrated. They came west in 1881 and our subject worked at brickmaking with his father in various places along the coast until 1889, when our subject was obliged, on account of the ill health of his wife, to return to Illinois. She died there the same year. Two children had been born to them, Edward and Frances, both at home. After his wife's death, our subject returned to Oregon and took a homestead on McKenzie river in Lane county, where he engaged in farming and milling until 1900. In that year he came to Crook county and raised sheep one year. Then he sold his sheep and purchased the place where he now resides.

On May 17, 1895, Mr. Ream contracted a second marriage, this time, taking Mrs. Elizabeth Wade, a native of Texas, as his bride. Her parents, James H. and Margaret (Hurst) Wade, were natives of Texas and Alabama, respectively. Mrs. Wade died in her native state and Mr. Wade came to Oregon and settled in Lane county. Mr. and Mrs. Ream are the parents of four children, Daniel, Archie, Maude, and Nora.

Politically, Mr. Ream is very liberal, choosing men and principles for himself, rather than having the directions of any party. In educational matters, he is very active and a strong advocate of good schools and in fact everything for the upbuilding of the country.

J. O. GARNER has demonstrated what a man can do in this rich section of the west by taking hold with his hands with energy and wisdom. He resides on the Grindstone, just out from Suplee and follows farming and stock raising. His birth occurred in Iowa, on October 4, 1859, his father being Frank Garner, a native of Indiana. In very early days he moved to Iowa and followed farming. When ten years of age, our subject went from Iowa to Missouri and there remained until he had grown to manhood being occupied in the meantime in farming. His education was secured from the public schools and he remained in Missouri until 1884. In that year Mr. Garner decided to come west and after investigating concluded that Central Oregon was the best spot to locate. He accordingly made his way to Crook county and soon began to work for wages. Shortly thereafter he took land where he now resides and as the years went by, has added by purchase until he now owns ten hundred and forty acres. The same is well supplied with all improvements and handled in a skillful manner, for Mr. Garner is a good stockman and a wise farmer. His stock consists of horses and cattle of which he has a goodly number. He is one of the respected men of the community and is well known for his integrity and sagacity.

ALFRED HENRY GRANT, postmaster of Bend, Crook county, Oregon, and the first one to fill that official position, was born in the West Indies, October 3, 1846, the son of Alfred and Katherine (Blair) Grant, both natives of England. The father of our subject was a major in the regiment commanded by the Prince of Wales, and was stationed in the West Indies where our subject was born. He was on the island of Jamaica in 1859. The mother, after the death of her husband, came to the United States, and after traveling extensively through the eastern portion of this country, located in Canada, where she died, May 28, 1864.

The greater part of our subject's early youth was passed in the West Indies with his parents, and until he was thirteen years of age. He received his early education at home, his parents engaging for this purpose an accomplished tutor. At the age of thirteen he went to England where he resumed his studies which had been temporarily interrupted, and again under a private tutor. At the age of seventeen years young Grant ran away from home and enlisted in the English army with which he remained seven years. He then purchased his discharge and came to the United States. This was in 1870. Until 1874 he served in the capacity of bookkeeper for the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company, located in Chicago. That year he went to California where he worked at various employments for wages, remaining in the Golden State until 1890, when he migrated to Utah and Wyoming, still pursuing a variety of industries. During the year 1899 Mr. Grant was a deputy county clerk in the state of Wyoming. Subsequently he served on a steamer trading between this coast and China and Japan. In the course of his extensive travels our subject has visited all the continents with the exception of Africa. For a period of two years he was bookkeeper for the Baldwin Sheep & Land Company.

Mr. Grant came to Bend in May, 1903, where, in company with some associates he erected a store—the first one in the place. He disposed of his interest in this enterprise and was appointed postmaster at Bend, April 16, 1904, which position he still retains and the duties of which he performs efficiently and satisfactorily. In 1900 Mr. Grant was united in marriage to Miss Bertie

Fraternally our subject is a member of the I. O. O. F., the Sons of St. George and the M. W. A. Politically his affiliations are with the Republican party.

W. E. GUERIN, Jr., a prominent banker and leading business man of Bend, Crook county, was born in Fort Scott, Kansas, November 24, 1871. His father, W. E. Guerin, is a retired capitalist, residing in New York city.

When quite young the subject of this biographical sketch removed from Kansas to the state of Ohio. He laid the groundwork of an excellent education in the public schools of the Buckeye State. Subsequently he was matriculated in Cornell University, one of the leading colleges of the United States, from which he was graduated with honors.

In December, 1893, Mr. Guerin was admitted to the bar, commencing the practice of law in Ohio. In this state he was elected to the legislature, being a member of the Seventy-fifth Assembly.

April 1, 1904, Mr. Guerin came to Bend and is now president of the Central Oregon Banking and Investment Company. He erected a substantial building for the business of the company, his attention being divided between commercial pursuits and the practice of law. He is, also, the principal promoter of an excellent telephone system throughout the Bend country, and has charge of the sale of the land of the Des Chutes Irrigation & Power Company.

March 7, 1895, Mr. Guerin was united in marriage to Miss Alice T. Greenleaf. They have one child, Mary B. Fraternally our subject is a member of the Elks, and all the branches of Masonry, including the Scottish High Masons.

Mr. Guerin is a man of excellent business sagacity, popular in the community in which he resides and one who has a lively interest in the social and commercial welfare of the town of Bend.

PART VII

HISTORY OF LAKE COUNTY

EXPLORATION AND INDIAN WARS.

The political division of which we are now about to tell is the county of Lake, situated in the south central portion of the state of Oregon, a county whose population is less than one person to each two square miles of area; a county of lakes, of mountains, of fertile valleys, of deserts, and of great possibilities.

This great section of the state of Oregon was, before the advent of the white man, the home of the Indians. The natives who inhabited the lake country belonged to the Shoshone family, whose territory spread over Southeastern Oregon, Southern Idaho and the whole of Utah and Nevada, extending into Arizona and New Mexico, and the eastern border of California. This family has been divided by historians into two great nations, the Snakes, or Shoshones proper, and the Utahs; and these nations in turn were divided into several different tribes, who claimed different sections of the country as their home. The Snake branch of the family inhabited Southeastern Oregon, Idaho, Western Montana, and the northern portions of Utah and Nevada.

Here, from time immemorial, in the valleys and on the lake shores of the present Lake county dwelt one tribe of the savage and warlike Snakes. Here were doubtless fought many bloody battles in ages past with the other warlike tribes who inhabited the Northwest, for the Snakes of the lake country bore the reputation of being the most crafty and best skilled in war of all their neighbors. They tell of many battles and wars in which their forefathers took part before the white man was known to exist. All this is legendary, however, from the historian's standpoint, and we must content ourselves with the history of the lake country after it became known to the Caucasian race.

This country, for ages past the home of the Indian alone, was not destined to always remain so. Early in the nineteenth century the fur traders began to penetrate the interior of the northwest country. At first these traders did not send their men into the remote places, but gradually they were sent farther and farther into the interior until nearly every part of the country was covered.

That they penetrated the Eastern Oregon country at a very early day is known for fact, though the records of their visits are very meager. In these explorations and trapping expeditions there is evidence that the lake country, which was afterwards formed into Lake county, was covered to some extent and knowledge of the country gained. Ewing Young, in the fall of 1833, led a trapping company from the tributary streams of the Columbia river, across Oregon, to the upper end of the Sacramento valley. The records fail to state the exact route taken, and it may have been by the way of Goose lake and Pit river; in fact, that is the most practicable route of travel between the two points named.

But we have better evidence than this that the present Lake county was visited during the thirties by employes of the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1838 Col. J. J. Abert, a United States engineer, prepared a map of the Oregon country, in which Warner lake and other natural features of the present Lake county had a place. The data for this map, as credited by Col. Abert, was procured from Hudson's Bay explorers and trappers. Another map prepared from the same sources was published in 1844 by M. Mofras, attache of the French legation to Mexico. These maps showed a chain of four lakes in Warner valley, lying in a northeast and southwest direction, called by Mofras "lacs des plants"—lakes of plants or vegetable growth—and according to Abert, connected by "Plants river." Upon Mofras' map is shown a train called "Route des wagons des Utae Unis au Oullamet"—the United States wagon road to the Willamette—crossing the valley between the second and third of the "lacs des plants."

The first visit of members of the Caucasian race to the present Lake county, Oregon, of which there is record, was in December, 1843, when John C. Fremont, the Pathfinder, and party traversed the county, while on his second exploring expedition to the northwest coast. The party was on a journey through the unexplored regions between the Columbia river and California, and embracing the central basin of the continent between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevadas. It was not originally intended to cross the latter, but to turn homeward over the Rocky mountains at some pass near the headwaters of the Arkansas.

The start was made from The Dalles of the Columbia river about the nineteenth of November, 1843. In his reports Fremont said of the proposed trip:

This was our projected line of return—a great part of it absolutely new to geographical, botanical and geological science—and the subject of reports in relation to lakes, rivers, deserts, and savages hardly above the condition of mere wild animals, which inflamed desire to know what this terra incognita really contained. It was a serious enterprise, at the commencement of winter, to undertake the traverse of such a region, and with a party consisting only of twenty-five persons, and they of many nations—American, French, German, Canadian, Indian and colored—and most of them young, several being under twenty-one years of age. All knew that a strange country was to be explored, and dangers and hardships to be encountered; but no one blanched at the prospect. On the contrary, courage and confidence animated the whole party. Cheerfulness, readiness, subordination, prompt obedience, characterized all; nor did any extremity of peril and privation, to which we were afterwards exposed, ever belie, or derogate from, the fine spirit of this brave and generous commencement.

Space will not permit our giving an extended account of this trip through the Eastern Oregon country, except that part of it through the country now embraced within the boundaries of Lake county. Coming from Klamath marsh the explorers entered the present Lake county in the Sican marsh country, which marsh Fremont called a "green savannah." From here the party proceeded east to Sumner lake, which name was given to the lake by Fremont. Although in the dead of winter, he found the lake and valley free from snow. Thence the party crossed Chewaucan marsh and discovered Abert lake, which was so named in honor of Col. J. J. Abert, chief of the bureau of topographical engineers of the army at that time, and under whose direction Capt. Fremont was then working. Leaving Abert lake the party proceeded in a southeasterly direction to Warner valley, which it reached December 23.

On December 15 Fremont wrote as follows. The party was then just entering Lake county from the west:

A present consisting of useful goods afforded much satisfaction to our guides; and, showing them the national flag, I explained that it was a symbol of our nation; and they engaged always to receive it in a friendly manner. The chief pointed out a course, by following which we would arrive at a big water, where no more snow was to be found. Crossing a hard frozen swamp on the further side of the Rond, we entered again the pine forest, in which very deep snow made our traveling slow and laborious. We were slowly but gradually ascending a mountain; and, after a hard journey of seven hours, we came to some naked places among the timber, where a few tufts of grass showed above the snow, on the side of a hollow; and here we encamped. Our cow, which every day got poorer, was killed here, but the meat was rather tough.

On December 16 Summer lake was discovered, and in his diary that day Fremont wrote:

We traveled this morning through snow about three feet deep, which, being crusted, very much cut the feet of our animals. The mountain still gradually rose; we crossed several spring heads covered with quaking asp, otherwise it was all pine forest. The air was dark with falling snow, which everywhere weighed down the trees. The depths of the forest were profoundly still; and below, we scarce felt a breath of the wind which whirled the snow through their branches. I found that it required some exertion of constancy to adhere steadily to one course through the woods, when we were uncertain how far the forest extended, or what lay beyond; and, on account of our animals, it would be bad to spend another night on the mountain. Toward noon the forest looked clear ahead, appearing:

suddenly to terminate; and beyond a certain point we could see no trees. Riding rapidly ahead to this spot, we found our selves on the verge of a vertical and rocky wall of the mountain. At our feet—more than a thousand feet below—we looked into a green prairie country, in which a beautiful lake, some twenty miles in length, was spread out along the foot of the mountains, its shores bordered with green grass. Just then the sun broke out among the clouds, and illuminated the country below, while around us the storm raged fiercely. Not a particle of ice was to be seen on the lake, or snow on its borders, and all was like summer or spring. The glow of the sun in the valley below brightened up our hearts with sudden pleasure, and we made the woods ring with joyful shouts to those behind; and gradually as each came up, he stopped to enjoy the unexpected scene. Shivering on snow three feet deep, and stiffening in a cold north wind, we exclaimed at once that the names of Summer Lake and Winter ridge should be applied to these two proximate places of such sudden and violent contrast.

We were now immediately on the verge of the forest land, in which we had been traveling so many days; and looking forward to the east, scarce a tree was to be seen. Viewed from our elevation, the face of the country exhibited only rocks and grass, and presented a region in which the artemisia became the principal wood, furnishing to its scattered inhabitants fuel for their fires, building material for their huts, and shelter for the small game which ministers to their hunger and nakedness. Broadly marked by the boundary of the mountain wall, and immediately below us, were the first waters of that Great Interior Basin which has the Wahsatch and the Bear river mountains for its eastern, and the Sierra Nevada for its western rim; and the edge of which we had entered upwards of three months before at the Great Sale Lake.

When we had sufficiently admired the scene below, we began to think about descending, which here was impossible, and we turned toward the north, traveling always along the rocky wall. We continued on for four or five miles, making ineffectual attempts at several places; and at length succeeding in getting down at one which was extremely difficult of descent. Night had closed in before the foremost had reached the bottom, and it was dark before we all found ourselves together in the valley. There were three or four half-dead dry cedar trees on the shore, and those who first arrived kindled bright fires to light on the others. One of the mules rolled over and over two or three hundred feet into a ravine, but recovered himself without any other injury than to his pack; and the howitzer was left midway the mountain until morning.

On the 23d we find the party approaching Warner lake. Fremont's journal for the rest of the time the party was in Lake county follows:

Dec. 23.—The weather is mild, the thermometer at daylight 38 degrees, the wind having been from the south for several days. The country has a very forbidding appearance, presenting to the eye nothing but sage and barren ridges. We rode up toward the mountain; along the foot we found a lake which we could not approach on account of the mud, and passing its southern end, ascended the slope at the foot of the ridge, where in some hollows we had discovered bushes and small trees in which situation a sure sign of water. We found here several springs, and the hillside was well sprinkled with a species of festuca, a better grass than we had found for many days. Our elevated position gave us a good view over the country, but we discovered nothing very encouraging. Southward, about ten miles distant, was another small lake, toward which a broad trail led along the ridge, and this appearing to afford the most practicable route, determined to continue our journey in that direction.

Dec. 24.—We found the water of the lake tolerably pure and encamped at the farther end. There was some good grass and canes along the shore and the vegetation at this place consisted principally of chenopodiaceous shrubs.

Dec. 25.—We were aroused on Christmas morning by a discharge from the small arms and howitzer, with which our people saluted the day, and the name of which we bestowed upon the lake. It was the first time, perhaps, in this remote and desolate region in which it had been so commemorated. The day was sunny and warm, and, resuming our journey, we crossed some slight dividing grounds into a similar basin, walled in on the right by a lofty mountain ridge. The plainly beaten trail still continued, and occasionally we passed camping grounds of the Indians, which indicated to me that we were on one of the great thoroughfares of the country. In the afternoon I attempted to travel in a more easterly direction, but after a few more laborious miles was beaten back into the basin by an impassible country. We encamped on the valley bottom, where there was some cream-like water in ponds colored by a clay soil and frozen over. Chenopodiaceous shrubs constituted the growth, and made again our fire wood. The animals were driven to the hills where there was tolerable good grass.

Dec. 26.—Our general course was again south, the country consists of larger or smaller basins into which the mountain waters run down, forming small lakes; they present a perfect level from which the mountains rise immediately and abruptly. Between the successive basins the dividing ground is usually very slight, and it is probable that in seasons of high water many of these basins are in communication. At such times there is evidently an abundance of water, though now we find scarcely more than the dry beds. On either side the mountains, though not very high, appear to be rocky and sterile. The basin in which we were traveling declined toward the southwest corner, where the mountains indicate a narrow outlet, and turning around a rocky point or cape, we continued up a lateral branch valley, in which we encamped at night on a rapid, pretty little stream of water, which we found unexpectedly among the sage on the right side of the valley. It was bordered with grassy bottoms and clumps of willows, the water partially frozen. This stream belongs to the basin we had left. By a partial observation tonight, our camp was found to be directly on the 42d parallel.

The camp of December 24 was probably on Christmas lake, north of the stone bridge. The camp on Christmas was, in all probability, at the place which is now known as Long Point. Leaving Warner valley Fremont proceeded southward and entered California, reaching Pyramid lake January 14, 1844.

It was nearly six years after the Fremont expedition before the next party of white men set foot on the soil of Lake county, so far as any records show. This was an exploring party under command of Capt. William H. Warner, U. S. Topographical Engineer, who in 1849, under the direction of General Persifer F. Smith, explored the country on the southern boundary line of Oregon for a practicable emigrant and military road and also for a railroad pass about that latitude. Accompanying Capt. Warner was an escort of the Second infantry, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Casey.

The party left Sacramento in August, 1849, and examined the country for several weeks to the east of the headwaters of the Sacramento, coming upon a pass in the Sierra Nevada with an elevation of not more than thirty-eight feet to the mile. Warner explored the country to the east and north of Goose lake, and several weeks were spent in the Warner basin. In returning through the mountains the party was set upon by Indians on September 26. Capt. Warner, Francis Bercier, the guide, and George Cove were killed. The exact spot upon which this tragedy was enacted has not been determined, but it is generally believed to have been in Warner valley. A range of mountains, a valley and lake have been given the name of Warner in honor of the explorer. After the death of Capt. Warner the command of the expedition fell to Lieut. R. S. Williamson, who continued the work and reported in favor of the Pit river route.

After this disastrous expedition of 1849 and until the early sixties the country now embraced within the boundaries of Lake county was not penetrated by white men, so far as is known. During these years it was the home of the Snakes, who dwelt here in all their savage freedom, unmolested by the whites. These Indians, it is believed, occasionally took part in the massacre of immigrants on their way to the settlements by way of the south road, but their remoteness from the settlements prevented any successful pursuit or campaign against them such as was the lot of the Modocs and other tribes who were guilty of the same offenses.

The discovery of gold in Eastern Oregon and Idaho in the early sixties was the cause of the lake country becoming quite well known and the traversing of the country by a detachment of volunteer troops under Co. C. S. Drew in 1864.

In order to make clear the object of the troops in penetrating this country at this time, we shall divert here to give a brief description of the conditions as they were in this part of the Northwest. The newly discovered gold fields of John Day, Powder river and Jordan creek in Eastern Oregon and Boise, Idaho, caused a heavy influx of miners and others to those districts from the settlements of Western Oregon and Northern California. The natural routes of travel to these newly discovered mines was through the unsettled Snake and Piute country, and as that tribe was then, as it had always been, hostile to the whites, and was continually robbing and murdering all small parties passing through their country, as well as annoying the frontier settlements and advanced mining camps, it was deemed necessary to establish military posts in the vicinity of these routes of travel and near the settlements, not only as points from which to send scouting parties to protect settlers and travelers, but as bases from which to send expeditions to hunt down and punish the aggressive Indians. It was in pursuance to that policy that a line of posts from Chico, California, to Owyhee, Idaho, the main route of travel from California points to the new mines, was established, part of the route being garrisoned or guarded by posts in California and Nevada by California troops, and the northern part by Oregon troops.

While the principal forts on the immediate frontier were made permanent, the numerous small stations along the routes of travel were more temporary. Thus Fort Klamath in Oregon, Fort Bidwell in California, Fort Boise in Idaho; and others were the main frontier posts, while Camps Alvord, McGary, C. F. Smith and others were points on or very near the routes of travel, and from these points small parties of soldiers were distributed at the different stations on the road as guards.

While these forts were being established and the routes of travel protected, that strip of country lying along the California line between the Klamath lakes and Stein's mountain was being scoured by the soldiers as a separate district—being in fact a part of the district of California. It was during the summer of 1864 that the soldiers first entered this territory and traversed the country which ten years later was set off as Lake county.

Toward the last of March of this year, Col. Chas. S. Drew, of the Oregon volunteer cavalry, received orders at Camp Baker, in Jackson county from the department of the Pacific, to repair to Fort Klamath as soon as the road over the Cascades could be traveled, and leaving there men enough to guard the government property, to make a reconnaissance to the Owyhee country and return to Fort Klamath.

The snow being still deep on the summit of the mountains, in May a road was opened through it for several miles, and on the 26th the command left Camp Baker, arriving at Fort Klamath on the 28th. The Indians being turbulent in the vicinity of the fort, it became necessary to remain at that post until the 28th of June, when the expedition, consisting of thirty-nine enlisted men of Troop C, First Oregon Cavalry, proceeded to Williamson river, and thence to the Sprague river valley, over a succession of low hills, covered for the most part with an open forest of pines. He had proceeded no farther than Sprague river when his march was interrupted by news of an attack on a train from Shasta valley, California, proceeding by the way of Klamath lake, Sprague river and Silver lake to the John Day mines.

This attack occurred within the boundaries of the present Lake county, near Silver lake. The train was in charge of John Richardson and consisted of seven wagons and fifteen men, several of whom were accompanied by their families. The Indians fell upon the train on June 23 and succeeded in capturing seven oxen and 3,500 pounds of flour. Three men were wounded in the fight. Fortunately Lieutenant Davis from Fort Crook, California, with ten men came up with the train in time to render assistance and prevent a massacre.

The train, escorted by Lieut. Davis, fell back forty miles to a company in the rear, and sent news of the attack to Fort Klamath, after which they retreated to Sprague river. An ambulance having been sent to take the wounded to the fort, the immigrants all determined to travel under Drew's protection to the Owyhee, and thence to the John Day.

Col. Drew, escorting the immigrant train, then proceeded up Sprague river to its headwaters, and across the Goose Lake mountains into Drew's valley, so named after the expedition's commander. From here the party entered Goose Lake valley and proceeded around the head of the lake to a point thirty-one miles down its east side to the intersection with the immigrant road from the states near Lassen's pass, where a number of trains joined the expedition. Passing eastward from this point, Drew's route led into Fandango valley, a glade a mile and a half west from the summit of the old immigrant pass, and thence over the summit of Warner range into Surprise valley, passing across it and around the north end of Cowhead lake, eastward over successive ranges of rocky ridges, down a canyon into Warner valley, and around the south side of Warner mountain, where he narrowly escaped attack by their redoubtable chief Paulina, who was deterred only by seeing the howitzer in the train. Proceeding southeast over a sterile country to Pu-ebla valley, the expedition turned northward to Camp Alvord, having lost so much time in escort duty that the original design of exploring about the headwaters of the Owyhee could not be carried out. The last wagons reached Drew's camp, two miles east of Alvord, on the 31st of August. From this point, with a detachment of nineteen men, Drew proceeded to Jordan creek valley and Fort Boise, escorting the immigration to these points, and returning to camp September 22. Here he found awaiting him an order requiring his immediate return to Fort Klamath, to be present with his command at a council to be held the following month with the Klamaths, Modocs and Paulina's band of Snake Indians.

On his return march Drew avoided going around the southeastern point of the Warner mountains, finding a pass through them which shortened his route nearly seventy miles, the road being nearly straight between Stein's and Warner mountains. Thence he went westward across the ridge into Goose Lake valley, with a saving in distance of another forty miles. On rejoining his former trail he found it traveled by immigration to Rogue river valley, which passed down Sprague river and by the Fort Klamath road to Jacksonville. A line of communication was opened from that place to Owyhee and Boise, which was deemed well worth the labor and cost of the expedition, the old immigrant road being shortened between two and three hundred miles. The military gain was the discovery of the haunt of Paulina and his band at Warner mountain, and the discovery of the necessity for a military post in Goose Lake valley.

Again in 1865 the country now embraced in Lake county was traversed by the Oregon volunteers, who followed practically the same route as that of Col. Drew of the year before. One or two skirmishes with the Indians took place this year. It was early in the summer of 1865 that B.

J. Pengra, the president of the Southern Oregon Military Wagon Road Company, was surveying the route of that road from Eugene, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of the state. He asked for and obtained an escort of a portion of Company A, First Oregon Cavalry, commanded by Capt. J. M. McCall. They established the line of their road on the route of Col. Drew's expedition of the year before. The escorting party was augmented by a detachment of Company C, First Oregon Cavalry, Capt. Kelly, at or near Stein's mountain, and on its return, late in August, was met at Round Grove, near the head of Sprague river, by Capt. Sprague's detachment of Company I, First Oregon Infantry, and a detachment of Company C, First Oregon Cavalry, commanded by Second Lieutenant Patrick McGuire. Orders were borne by these latter troops for Capt. Kelly's detachment to proceed with Capt. Sprague's commands to Stein's mountain to aid Capt. Borling, of Company G, First Oregon, Infantry, in establishing and maintaining the military post of Camp Alvord, in the present county of Harney.

Capt. Kelly, owing to some trouble between himself and Major W. V. Rinehart, then in command of Fort Klamath, returned with Capt. McCall's company to the latter post under arrest. The troops designated, under the command of Capt. F. B. Sprague, proceeded on the expedition.

Sprague's orders were to go by way of Surprise valley and arrange co-operative measures with the commander of the post there. But when he arrived at Camp Bidwell, on the 28th of October, Capt. Starr, of the Second California Volunteer Infantry, was already under orders to repair with his company, except twenty-five men, to Fort Crook, before the mountains became impassible with snow.

He decided, however, to send ten men, under Lieut. Backus, with Sprague's escort, to prove the supposed location of the main body of the Indians. On the third day, going north, having arrived at Warner's creek, which enters the east side of the lake seven miles south of the crossing of the Drew road, without falling in with any Indians, Backus turned back to Camp Bidwell, and Sprague proceeded.

No sooner had this occurred than signs of the enemy began to appear, who were encountered 125 strong, about two miles south from the road. While the troops were passing an open space between the lake and the side of a mountain they were attacked by the savages hidden in trenches made by land-slides and behind rocks. Sprague, being surprised, and unable either to climb the mountain or swim the lake, halted to take in the situation. The attacking parties were in the front and rear, but he observed that those in the rear were armed with bows and arrows, while those in front had among them about twenty-five rifles. The former were leaving their hiding places to drive him upon the latter. Observing this, he made a sudden charge to the rear, escaping unharmed and returning to Camp Bidwell.

On November 15, owing to the fact that there were not enough rations at Alvord for all the troops there to winter on, and the failure to hear from any source of supplies being forwarded, First Sergeant O. A. Stearns, of Company I, First Infantry, was ordered to return to Fort Klamath with part of the troops. This he did, taking with him twenty-five men of I Company First Infantry; twenty-five men of C Company, First Cavalry; ten men of A Company, First Cavalry, and a train of fifty mules that had been hired to convey the provisions, equipments, etc., or the outgoing troops. Later supplies were received at Camp Alvord via Fort Boise.

Two days after Sergeant Stearns and his troops started, all the cavalry horses at Alvord were run off by Indians leaving nothing but teams and pack mules for mounts for the cavalry troops, and for a fruitless pursuit of the thieves. This fact also prevented the overtaking and bringing back of the troops under Sergeant Stearns, as was desired.

The early abandonment of Camp Alvord and many of the other frontier posts and the establishment of Camp Warner, Camp Harney and others would seem to indicate that the earlier posts were not well placed for the purposes desired, doubtless from insufficient knowledge of the country to be policed.

Thus we learn from these expeditions and campaigns that Lake county during the early sixties, though without a settler within the whole length and breadth of it, had been visited a number of times and at least a portion of its topography known. A little later, when a military post, Camp Warner, was established within its boundaries, and the Indian war begun, it became better known, and with the termination of the war by General Crook in 1868, the country was so well known that the following year settlers began to pour in.

So far the military authorities had only attempted to provide protection for travelers going through the lake country and no vigorous campaign had been waged against the Indians. The murders and robberies continued, and it was finally decided to begin a campaign against the Indians to punish them for the past misdeeds and to exert a wholesome effect upon their future conduct.

Early in 1866 Major-General F. Steele took command of the Department of the Columbia. He caused the abandonment of many of the camps in Southeastern Oregon, but he also made provision for the establishment of others. So early as March 20 he wrote to General Halleck, commanding the Division of the Pacific, that the Indians had commenced depredations, with such signs of continued hostilities in southern portions of Oregon and Idaho that he should recommend the establishment of two posts during the summer from which to operate against them the following winter, one at or near Camp Wright, and another in Goose Lake valley, from which several roads diverged leading to other valleys frequented by hostile Snakes, Utes, Pit Rivers, Modocs and Klamaths.

Accordingly, that year a small party was sent out from Fort Vancouver into the interior country to select a site for a fort from which to operate against and hold in subjugation the murdering savages. This party selected the point in Warner valley, on the west side of the lake, upon which Camp Warner was afterwards built by Gen. Crook.

However, Camp Warner was first established to the east of Warner lake. Troops stationed at Fort Boise were ordered to proceed to the point selected and there establish a camp. The command reached Lake Warner, and the discovery being made that the lake was many miles in length and that the country bordering its shores was rough and hazardous, the commanding officer decided that it would be best to establish camp on the east side of the lake and here the camp was made. It was at a point about fifteen miles east of North Warner basin, and became a military post in the year 1866. This camp is generally referred to as Old Camp Warner to distinguish it from the Camp Warner which took its place the following year on the other side of the lake.

During the fall of 1866, after the establishment of the camp, a number of scouting parties scoured the southeastern part of Oregon. They skirmished here and there, seldom inflicting or sustaining much loss. One of the most important of these skirmishes took place in territory later formed into Lake county. On September 26 Lieut. Small attacked the enemy at Lake Abert, and after a fight of three hours, routed them, killing fourteen and taking seven prisoners. The horses, rifles and winter stores of the Indians fell into the hands of the troops.

Shortly after the skirmish at Lake Abert, another fight with the Indians took place on Lake county soil—on Chewaucan marsh. On the morning of the fifteenth of October Lieutenant Oatman, First Oregon Infantry, from Fort Klamath, with twenty-two men and five Klamaths as scouts, set out for Fort Bidwell to receive reinforcements and provisions for an extended scouting expedition. He was joined by Lieutenant Small with twenty-seven cavalymen. The command marched to the Warner Lake basin, seeking the rendezvous of the enemy. Two days were spent in vain search, when the command undertook to cross the mountains to Lake Abert, at their western base, being guided by Henry Blowe, a Klamath chief. After proceeding six miles in a direct course, a deep canyon was encountered running directly across the intended route, which was followed for ten miles before any crossing offered which would permit the troops to pass on to the west. Such a crossing was at last found, the mountain being passed on the twenty-sixth and at eleven o'clock of this day the command entered the beautiful valley of the Chewaucan by a route never before traveled by white men.

About two and one-half miles from the point where they entered the valley, Indians were discovered running toward the mountains. Being pursued by the troops, they took up their position in a rocky canyon. Leaving the horses with a guard, the main part of the command advanced, and dividing, passed up the ridges on both sides of the ravine, while a guard remained at its mouth. At twelve o'clock the firing began and was continued for three hours. Fourteen Indians were killed and twice as many wounded. The Indians then fled into the mountains and the troops returned to their respective posts.

But these brushes with the Indians were of infrequent occurrence before Gen. Crook's arrival at Old Camp Warner and the subsequent removal of his command to the new camp. The lake tribes and their allies, consisting of marauding bands from different other tribes, had been carrying things their own way throughout the Southeastern Oregon country. The soldiers in the field were brave enough and were constantly on the alert, but they were unfortunate in not finding the Indians. The latter were generally broken up in small marauding squads, knew the country well, and after raiding a settlement or immigrant train, fled across the desert like Arabs and hid in some small valley, rich with grass and surrounded by rock-ribbed mountains that were divided from the next range by a wide expanse of desert. When tired of their retreat they would break forth again, and another Indian raid, leaving crime and death in its trail, would be reported at military headquarters. The soldiers would rush out to the pursuit, but the Indians had already generally made their escape, even beyond finding their trail.

Late in 1866 George Crook, then Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twenty-third Infantry, later general, relieved Marshall in the command of the district of Boise, and at once began a vigorous campaign. Crook was a man of quiet determination, and his previous record as an Indian fighter was good. The people of Oregon expected much of him, and they were not disappointed. To him is due the credit of subduing the hostile Indians of Southeastern Oregon, thus making possible the settlement of that vast country.

When Crook took charge Eastern Oregon was for the most part a terra incognita. The Oregon volunteers had spent some time in exploring it and tracking the Indians to their hitherto unknown haunts. Now it was decided that the Indians must be fought in the winter, and preparations were made for that style of campaign. Two companies of Indians allies were formed, who materially assisted in the campaign.

Crook, in assuming command, found that the Indians were already hemmed in by a cordon of camps and posts, with detachments continually in the field harassing and reducing them, but unable to capture them and break their power. With a small company he had started out to his new command at Warner from Boise, and on the way he had not been idle. He had made a circuit from his most direct route more than once on the way to attack Indians who had committed depredations in the settlements. The fact that with his small command he had done more Indian fighting on his way from Boise to Camp Warner than the command stationed at the latter place had done altogether led the men to believe that there was now going to be something doing.

The winter of 1866-7 was very severe in the Warner lake region, which has an altitude of about 5000 feet above sea level. The soldiers at the camp suffered severely in consequence. It is said that the entire company were compelled to walk around a small circle in the snow for several nights, not daring to lie down to sleep for fear they would freeze to death. There was at least one death from the cold during the winter. A sergeant got lost and perished in the snow.

It was partly due to the severe weather, and partly to the fact that General Crook considered the site a poor one from which to operate, that induced the relocation of the camp in the summer of 1867. On the 29th of July Crook left Old Camp Warner with forty troops under Capt. Harris, proceeded by Darragh with his company of scouts, with a view of selecting a site for a new camp. Passing southerly around the base of Warner buttes, and north again to the Drew crossing of the shallow strait between Warner lakes, he encamped on Honey creek, fifteen miles northwest of the old camp. Here he found Darragh, whom he followed the next day up the creek ten miles, finding that it headed in a range of finely timbered mountains trending north and south, with patches of snow on their summits.

July 31 the new camp was located in an open timbered country, about fifteen miles west of North Warner Basin and thirty-five miles north of the Oregon, California and Nevada state boundary line, in latitude 42 degrees, 50 minutes north, and longitude 120 degrees west. The elevation was 500 feet lower than that of the former camp. The selection of the new site was made in keeping with the government's usual care and judgment in such matters. The place was surrounded by mountains with only one outlet. It could have been approached from only one direction by an enemy, and then one rapid firing gun could have defended the place against a thousand warriors. A large spring of pure water flowed out of the side of the mountain near the fort and this furnished a small waterworks which supplied the soldiers with all the pure water that was needed. The mountains were covered with stately pines, and from this forest they secured timber to construct the government buildings and wood for the fort. A small sawmill was set up in those days, and while some of the soldiers were fighting and scouting, others were engaged in logging, sawing and carpentering.

Concerning the removal from Old Camp Warner to the new camp Paul DeLaney has written:

When Gen. Crook arrived on the scene to take command in person of the troops and found that the originally selected site had not been made the headquarters, he is reported to have been very indignant. "Why did you not proceed to the place named in the orders?" the general is said to have asked. "We could not cross the lake," replied the officer previously in command.

Gen. Crook decided to move to the originally selected site immediately. The old camp was surrounded with lava rocks; in fact, the whole face of the earth was covered with them. The general selected the narrowest point across the lake and ordered men to bring rock to the shore at this place. The carts and wagons belonging to the command were brought into requisition. They were loaded with rock to their fullest capacity and were then backed up to the lake and the rocks dumped into the water. This was kept up until a foundation was made and a fill was started across the lake.

Men were placed on the fill as it proceeded to keep the rock straight and to see that they were properly placed, and in a few weeks the famous rock road across Warner lake was completed. Crook and his forces crossed over and built Camp Warner where it was originally intended to be.

This stone bridge still stands, and farmers occasionally cross the lake on it, though by its own weight all of these years it has sunk a few inches beneath the surface of the water, and during high stages of water it is sometimes a considerable depth below the surface.

On the first of August Crook's command, which had been on the west side of the lake selecting the new site, returned to the old camp, having discovered some fresh trails leading toward California. At the old camp were found Capt. Perry and McKay, who had returned from a scout to the southeast without finding an Indian. Archie McIntosh, a half breed Boise scout, had brought in eleven prisoners, making forty-six killed and captured by the allies within two weeks.

When Crook had completed the buildings at New Camp Warner he prepared for unceasing action. He had engaged the services of Indian scouts and these had not been idle. They informed him of the movements of the Indians, the number and their many places of rendezvous. The general sent out detachments of soldiers and kept the various bands of Indians on the go. They were practically squads of brigands and never strong enough to give the soldiers a standing fight. But Crook's pursuit of them was unrelenting. He would not give them time to rest or recuperate at any place. As soon as they would find what they deemed a safe retreat his men were upon them and they were kept upon the run.

On August 16, by a general order issued from the headquarters of the department of the Pacific, Fort Klamath, Camps Watson, Warner, Logan and Harney were designated as constituting the district of the lakes, and assigned to Crook, who also had command of the troops at Camp Bidwell, should he require their services.

General Crook set out about the first of September for that part of the country from which he believed reinforcements of the Indians to come. His forces consisted of three companies of cavalry, one of mounted infantry and all of the Indian allies. It was hoped that by marching by night and lying concealed by day, the troops might surprise some considerable number of the enemy. On the ninth Indians were reported in the tules about Lake Abert. On proceeding from camp on the east side of Goose lake two days in a north course, the trail of a party of Indians was discovered, but Crook believed them to be going south. Dividing his forces, he sent Capts. Perry and Harris and the Warm Spring allies north to scout the country between Sprague and Des Chutes rivers, taking in Crooked river and terminating their campaign at Camp Harney in Harney valley.

Crook with the rest of the forces took a southeast course to Surprise valley and the Pit river country. It is not the province of this work to tell the whole history of the Shoshone war, except as it relates to Lake county. Therefore it will be necessary to pass over, with a word or two, the interesting events that took place when Crook met the Indians in the country south of Lake county. Crook came upon the Indians well fortified in the lava beds. He fell upon them and a two days' battle ensued. The troops captured the fortress of the Indians, but the latter had escaped. On September 30 the troops began their return march, and on October 4 went into camp at new Camp Warner. Says Bancroft in his history of Oregon:

"The result of this long projected campaign could not be said to be a victory. According to Wassen, it was not claimed by the troops that more than fifteen Indians were killed at the Pit river fortress, while the loss sustained by the command in the two days' siege was eight killed and twelve wounded."

The expedition under Perry, which had proceeded north, did not find the enemy. However, fifty-one men from Fort Klamath and ten Klamath scouts, under Lieut. Small, came across hostile Indians in the vicinity of Silver and Abert lakes, and between the second and the twenty-second of September succeeded in killing twenty-three and capturing fourteen. Among the killed were two chiefs who had signed the treaty of 1864, and an influential medicine man.

During the winter of 1867-8 General Crook continued his aggressive campaign, and portions of his troops were constantly in the field, hunting down the now scattered bands of savages. This kind of warfare was beginning to tell and the various bands of marauders began to get together for mutual protection. Their provisions were running low, their horses were being reduced to skeletons by constant riding with no feed or rest. They had one resort which the white men had not yet discovered. This was a secluded valley where two rivers came together near the foothills of Stein's mountain, far away from the soldiers and the fort. Here they had long kept their wives and children, while they raided other portions of the country. Chased from one point to another on the desert by Crook's men, they began to gather at this point. Here they began a council of war and decided to make a final stand—not where they were, however, but at some other point on the desert, while their wives and children remained here in security. A number of their leaders were still on the plains, dodging the soldiers, and it was decided to wait until all were in before the final stand should be made.

Crook's scout located the Indians in their retreat in the Stein's mountain country. They immediately reported and Crook made preparations for the march. He led the command in person and marched night and day to the place. Fortune favored the troops, and the fates seemed to be against the Indians. A heavy headrise in the river completely hemmed in the Indians, and upon the arrival of the soldiers they found them at their mercy. The battle which ensued was known as the Battle of Donner and Blitzen, it having been fought on the creek of that name, and occurred in February, 1868. Fourteen Indians were killed and captured.

Another battle was fought with the Indians in the neighborhood of Stein's mountain on April 14, when several were killed. The troops met the Indians at other points that spring, and invariably defeated them. General Crook did not rest after his victories, but relentlessly pursued the scattered bands. He rounded up a considerable number of them in Devil's garden, in the lower part of Goose Lake valley, where he again defeated them and destroyed their property.

Gen. Crook's campaign had been of the whirlwind variety and the power of the hostiles was broken. There was nothing left for the Indians to do but surrender.

According to an order of Gen. Halleck, no treaty could be made with the Indians by the officers in his division without consulting him, and it became necessary for Crook to wait for instructions from San Francisco. He repaired in the meantime to Camp Harney, where the principal chiefs of the hostile bands were assembled, and where a council was held on the 30th of June, 1868.

"Do you see any fewer soldiers than two years ago?" asked he. "No; more." "Have you as many warriors?" "No; not half as many." "Very well; that is as I mean to have it until you are all gone." The chiefs knew that this was no empty treat and were terrified. They sued earnestly for peace, and Crook made his own terms. He did not offer to place them on a reservation, where they would be fed while they idled and plotted mischief. He simply told them he would acknowledge Wewawewa as their chief, who should be responsible for their good conduct. They might return free into their own country and establish their headquarters near Castle Rock on the Malheur, and so long as they behaved themselves honestly and properly they would not be molested. Crook's idea of the best way to maintain peace with these wild people seems to have been to show the natives that the whites did not fear them. Therefore the Indians were not entirely unarmed, but on the contrary, ammunition was issued them and orders were given for all the trading posts to supply ammunition to the Indians that they might make their living by hunting. These mild terms were eagerly accepted, and the property of their victims still in their possession was delivered up.

Crook had no faith in reservations, yet he felt that to leave the Indians at liberty was courting a danger from the enmity of white men who had personal wrongs to avenge which might provoke a renewal of hostilities. To guard against this, he caused the terms of the treaty to be extensively published, and appealed to the reason and good judgment of the people, reminding them what it had cost to secure the peace which he hoped they might now enjoy.

The disposition of these Indians was, however, an annoying and perplexing question. Among the worst of the tribes that took part in the Shoshone war were those inhabiting the Warner valley under Chief Otsehoe. Gen. Crook in military correspondence after the war said: "Among these bands and those near Harney are some as crafty and bad as any I have ever seen, and if they are retained in the vicinity of their old haunts, and the Indian department manages them as it has other tribes in most cases, there will be trouble."

Early in November, 1868, Superintendent A. B. Meacham, having been appointed to the position formerly held by Mr. Huntington, held a council with the Indians assembled at Camp Warner under Otsehoe and persuaded this chief to go with his followers upon the Klamath reservation. But the war department gave neither encouragement nor material assistance, although Otsehoe and other Indians about Warner lake were known by Crook to be of their race, and dangerous to leave at large.

True to his restless nature, Otsehoe left the reservation in the spring of 1870, where his people had been fed during the winter. They deserted in detachments, Otsehoe remaining to the last, but when the commissary required the chief to bring them back, he replied that Major Otis desired them to remain at Camp Warner, a statement which was true, at least in part, as Otis himself admitted.

Otsehoe, however, finally consented to make his home at Camp Yainix, so far as to stay on the reservation during the winter season, but roving abroad in the summer through the region about Warner and Goose lakes. On March, 1871, by executive order, a reservation containing 2,275 square miles was set apart on the north fork of the Malheur river, for the use of the Shoshones. In the autumn of 1873 a portion of them were induced to go upon it, most of whom absented themselves on the return of summer. Gradually, however, with many drawbacks, the Indian department obtained control of these nomadic peoples, who were brought under those restraints which are the first steps toward civilization.

Indian raids ceased in that portion of Oregon and peace has since reigned there. Where Gen. Crook's men scouted and fought Indians live now prosperous ranchers, and the site of Camp Warner is one of the most prosperous in the country.

Although the Shoshone war was at an end, Camp Warner was not abandoned at once, and a force of three companies remained there for several years. When the Modoc war broke out in 1872, troops from Camp Warner went to the front and took part in that bloody and disastrous war. After that war Camp Warner was abandoned, the troops leaving the camp during the months of October and November, 1873.

The site of Camp Warner is now an isolated ranch, many miles from any other habitation. The ranch house occupies the old parade grounds, and a beautiful meadow spreads out in front, and from this the stockman cuts enough hay annually to feed his band.

At first sight one would not recognize the evidences of the former days, but with a little information and a further investigation, one finds enough to convince one that it was really a military post, and there are many things to remind one of this. An old rock chimney stands alone on the hillside near the ranch house. It shows awkward, but substantial, construction. In front of the fire place, cut in this old chimney, the foundation logs of the former building still remain. Then, as one investigates further, piles of rocks are found here and there and the foundation logs of other buildings. These were the officers' quarters. The chimney, still standing, was the one that conveyed the smoke from Gen. Crook's headquarters while he was stationed at Camp Warner. The number of names cut into the hard rock indicates that many people have visited this remote point, many miles from railroads and even stage coaches. In fact, only a mere trail leads to it.

But these are not the only evidences of the presence of the government's strong arm here. On the opposite side of the parade grounds from the officers' quarters were the stables of the command. Here may be found mule shoes, harness buckles, parts of harness and traces, bridle bits and many other things that were required to handle the mounts. And about the grounds may be found old cooking utensils, broken sabers, officers' epaulets and other remnants of the equipments of the fort which were abandoned by the soldiers upon leaving it. The uniform initials "U. S." distinguish them from property belonging to civilians.

But up on the hill, nearby, surrounded by a grove of towering pines, are sadder evidences of the former days. Wooden headboards here and there, lying about the ground, tell in very dim letters of the death of this one or that who was a member of a certain company, while the posts that supported the fence around the little plat have long since been hauled away and destroyed.

CHAPTER II

SETTLEMENT AND CURRENT HISTORY—1869 TO 1905.

So far this history has treated of events that took place in the county-of-Lake-to-be prior to the arrival of the first settler. Up to the late sixties there was not a settler in the county. The lake country had been visited by a few trappers and explorers at a very early date. Later volunteer troops had passed through and gained some knowledge of the country. Then came the establishment of Camp Warner and the occupancy of the country of lakes by the soldiers. Coincident with this event was the Shoshone war, which kept the whole Eastern Oregon country in a state of nervous excitement, and which was not terminated until Gen. Crook had completely subjugated the hostile Indians in the summer of 1868.

It seems hardly creditable that any one would have had the hardihood to attempt to make his home in this country, overrun by hostile Indians, prior to the victory of Gen. Crook, and yet we find that such is the case.

In 1867 a man by the name of Joseph Ross settled in Goose Lake valley, just across the line in California, at the foot of "Sugar Hill." When he came there the Indians were on the warpath and had not yet felt the restraining hand of the military authorities. No lumber was to be had in the vicinity, of course, and as the task of getting logs out of the woods for a cabin was considered too risky by the daring adventurer, Ross concluded to forgo the luxury of a cabin, and burrowed his abode in the ground. Bands of Indians frequently visited the place, but because of Ross' manner of living and his peculiar ways he was not molested. Afterwards the Indians stated that they believed him a "crazy pale face," and for this reason no harm was done him.

Another settler of 1867 was David R. Jones, who claimed Lake county as his place of residence from Sept. 15, 1867, until his death, Oct. 10, 1901, over 34 years. Mr. Jones at an early day came by boat from New York to San Francisco. From there he had gone by stage to Jacksonville, Oregon, in 1860. Later he went to Washington Territory, and in 1866 to Idaho, where he engaged in the freighting business. In 1867 he loaded his big teams with grain and followed the soldiers to Camp Warner, where he arrived September 15, of that year. Here he made his home, and until the subjugation of the Indians the following year, he was under the protection of the camp. He took up a ranch in Warner valley near the camp and began raising hay, which he sold at the camp. He experienced all the perils and hardships incident to frontier life in the country's early history. Many hairbreadth escapes from the murderous Indians were his. Fleet footed and cautious as he was, in those days he came near meeting his death on several occasions.

One of the first settlers in Goose Lake valley was John O'Neil, who is still living in Lake county. When Gen. Crook took charge of the military forces in the lake country Mr. O'Neil came with him in charge of the pack train, and reached Camp Warner in July, 1868. The party stopped at Camp Warner for a time and then proceeded through Goose Lake valley to Fort Crook in California. Mr. O'Neil was again in charge of the pack train that accompanied the soldiers. After Gen. Crook left for Arizona, Mr. O'Neil returned to Goose Lake valley and settled near the state line, early in 1869.

A settler of Goose Lake valley in 1868 was A. Snider, who took up a claim at Willow Ranch, on the California side of the line.

This constitutes the list of settlers in the present Lake county and in Goose Lake valley close to the line until after the subjugation of the Indians. After it became known that the power of the Indians had been broken, there was quite a rush of settlers to Goose Lake valley, and during 1869 some score or two settlers came and began building their homes there.

E. C. Mason, afterwards closely identified with the political history of Lake county, settled in the valley on October 8, 1869. E. P. Bodger came the same year and settled about three miles over the line in California. Mr. Bodger was a prominent figure in the destinies of Goose Lake valley. He later removed to Alturas, California, where he died in 1904. E. V. Coffey came the same year and settled in Lake county. A. Z. Hammersley and William Hammersley came with their families and settled just south of the line. In the party with these two there came from the Willamette valley Joe Robnette, T. Reed, William Tandy, Robert Tandy, Milton Brown, A. F. Snelling, H. M. Henderson, Sparks, Stone and Bogue. The Tandys located three miles south of the line. Alexander Reed was another settler of 1869. He lived in Lake county for many years and became one of its best known citizens. All of these settlers had located in Goose Lake valley, and so far as we have been able to learn there was only one who located in the county that year outside of the valley. This one was M. McShane, who settled on Crooked creek.

E. B. Reed was also a settler of 1869. He was the first to file a water right in the present Lake county. In the records of Jackson county is filed the following official notice of this claim:

Goose Lake Valley, Jackson county, Ore.,

November 17, 1869.

Notice is hereby given that I, E. B. Reed, do this day claim all the water flowing down this canyon from this point up or from the head of my ditch made for the purpose of conveying the water flowing down this canyon, or that may hereafter flow down said canyon, to have and to hold the use of said water for milling, mining and irrigating purposes.

Said canyon is situated on the east side of Goose Lake valley, about four miles north of the line dividing the states of Oregon and California.

(Signed): E. B. REED.

Filed for record at four o'clock p. m. July 23, 1870, and recorded the same day. SILAS J. DAY, County Clerk Jackson county, Ore.

A. Tenbrook the same year settled on what is now known as the McKee ranch, some five or six miles south of Lakeview. Samuel Crane settled on the Vernon ranch, and gave the name to Crane creek. M. Cogswell located the Cogswell creek property; Alex Cooper took up the Robnette ranch; James Wardwell the Fleming place; Ben Warner what is now known as the Luhman place; Oliver Shafer the Reed place; Ira Cogswell the Studley place; Frank Cogswell the Deeter place; Alex Contner what is now the Converse ranch; B. F. Lewis located adjoining Ben Warner; John Clark near the state line; M. W. Bullard on the Lakeview townsite. Other settlers of this year were William Greenman and Milton Brown. August Miller brought in a band of cattle and became one of the first stock-raisers of Lake county. At Willow Ranch, on the California side of the state line, C. U. Snider secured a claim in 1869, and D. A. Lambert the same year became a settler of Warner valley.

So extensive was the settlement of Goose Lake valley during 1869 that parties conceived the idea of starting a store. Accordingly one was opened near the state line, on the Oregon side, by Desible, Powley & King, and a man by the name of Darling was put in charge. The venture was not a success and in a few weeks the firm failed and the stock was removed. Thus came and went Lake county's pioneer store.

The year 1870 brought a few more settlers, among them the Cooksey brothers, who settled in the north end of Goose Lake valley. The next year witnessed the arrival of a few more, and during the few succeeding years the settlement, while not large, was steady.

C. Hagerhorst came at an early day and was the first man to run sheep in Lake county. Captain Barnes located in Drew's valley in the early seventies and engaged in cattle raising. An early settler of North Warner valley was a man by the name of Ish. In South Warner William Wallace settled at the mouth of Deep creek, and Joseph Wheeler at the mouth of Twentymile creek at what is known as the dug out. Both these settlers came at an early day.

During the winter of 1871-2 the settlers of Goose Lake valley devoted themselves to prospecting the hills on both sides of the valley for mineral, and succeeded in working up quite a mining excitement among themselves. Two mining districts were organized—Campbell's, on the west and north sides of Goose lake, and Goose Lake district to the east of the lake. In the records of Jackson county, of which county Goose Lake valley was then a part, are found the following notices of the formation of these districts:

Campbell Mining District, Goose Lake Valley, Ore.,

Silas J. Day, County Clerk Jackson County, Ore.:

Sir—You are hereby notified that at a miners' meeting held this day at the residence of Joseph Cooksey, at which twenty persons were present who are interested in mines, a mining district was formed, to be known as the "Campbell Mining District," and bounded as follows, viz.:

Commencing at the mouth of Drew's creek and running due west to the mountains beyond Sand creek, thence northerly along said summit to a point due west of the summit between Chewaucan and Goose Lake Valleys, thence to said summit and along the same easterly to the summit of the Sierra Nevada mountains, thence southerly along said summit to Bullard's canyon, thence westerly down said canyon to the foothills of Goose Lake valley, thence along said foothills southerly to the south side of Barton creek, thence down the south bank westerly to Goose lake and across said lake to the mouth of Drew's creek, the place of commencement, being all in Jackson county, state of Oregon. In witness whereof we have set our names this twenty-fifth day of December, 1871.

Silas J. Day, County Clerk, Jackson County, Ore.:

Sir—You are hereby notified that at a miners' meeting held at the residence of Ira Cogswell, Esq., on the 23d inst., a miners' district was formed, to be known as the "Goose Lake Mining District," bounded as follows, viz.: Commencing at the summit of the Sierra Nevada mountains on the California and Oregon state line, and running due west to Goose Lake, thence along the lake northerly to the mouth of Barton creek, thence along the south branch of said creek to the foothills of Goose Lake Valley, thence northerly along said foothills to Bullard's canyon, thence easterly up said canyon to the summit of the Sierra Nevada mountains, thence southerly along said summit to the state line, to the place of commencement, being all in Jackson county and state of Oregon. In witness whereof we have set our names this 8th day of January, A. D. 1872.

CHARLES A. COGSWELL, President.

M. J. COGSWELL, Recorder.

The instruments were both filed and recorded with the Jackson county clerk on February 2, 1872. The settlers did not confine their efforts to the creation of the mining districts; they prospected the hills, and thirty-three claims were located. Lake county undoubtedly contains some mineral, but it has not yet been located in quantities that would warrant extensive workings. The filings of claims in these two districts during the winter of 1871-2 are also a part of the records of Jackson county. They are as follows:

The year 1872 brought about the establishment of a mail route through the country afterwards set off as Lake county, and the establishment of the first postoffice. In 1870 the Oregon legislature had memorialized congress to grant mail facilities to that part of Southern Oregon east of the Cascades. The memorial was as follows:

To the Honorable Congress of the United States:

The memorial of the legislative assembly of the state of Oregon.

Your memorialists respectfully and earnestly represent that there is a large district of country in the southern portion of this state, embracing an area of over ten thousand square miles now being rapidly settled by citizens of the United States, which is at present destitute of any kind of mail facilities. To secure to the said citizens the desired mail accommodation, it is necessary that the following routes through said district be designated as post roads by act of Congress, viz.: From Ashland, Oregon, by Brown's, Link River, Lost River, Yainix, Drew's Valley, Hot Springs (in Goose Lake Valley) to Lake City (in California) two hundred and thirty-three miles; also from Yreka, California, by Ward's (on Klamath river, California), Brown's (on same river, Oregon), Link River, Klamath Agency, to Fort Klamath, one hundred and three miles.

Your memorialists further represent that the establishment of mail service over the above routes will secure mail supply to a population of over three thousand persons, who are at present destitute of any such accommodation.

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully pray your honorable body to pass an act establishing post roads over the routes above described.

Passed the House September 29, 1870.

B. HAYDEN.

Passed the Senate September 30, 1870.

JAMES D. DAY,
President of the Senate.

The request of the Oregon legislature was granted, and in the spring of 1872 a contract was let to Mr. Kilgore, of Ashland, to carry the mails from that point to Lake City, California. The contract called for weekly trips and for this service the contractor received nearly $5,000 per year. Mr. Kilgore had charge of the mail route until 1875. A route from Redding, California, north to connect with this line was also established. A postoffice was at once established at New Pine creek, in Goose Lake valley, just north of the state line, and the settlers for the first time had mail facilities. S. A. Hammersley was postmaster and the office was at his house.

The winter of 1872-3 was a severe one and many hardships were encountered in delivering the mail. A man by the name of Reed carried the mail between Linkville and New Pinereck on snow shoes, hauling a hand sled upon which the mail sacks were strapped. The snow that winter was so deep that it was impossible to keep a road open, and most of the travel was upon the lake, which was frozen over, and from the surface of which the wind blew the snow.

The establishment of the postoffice was a great convenience to the settlers. Before they had been obliged to go to Willow Ranch, and before the latter postoffice was established in 1869, the settlers had been obliged to go a much farther distance.

In 1873 the second postoffice was established in Goose Lake valley. This was at the A. Tenbrook ranch, some five or six miles south of the present town of Lakeview, and Mr. Tenbrook was the postmaster. Shortly after the establishment of the postoffice C. Hagerhorst started a store within a few rods of the postoffice. This was quite an event in the history of the valley. Before, the settlers had been obliged to go to Camp Warner or Willow Ranch for their supplies. While the Hagerhorst store was not conducted on a large scale and the stock of goods was limited, it answered the purposes. J. W. Howard, now a merchant of Lakeview, was a clerk in the Hagerhorst store. With the establishment of this enterprise the postoffice was moved to the store and Mr. Hagerhorst became postmaster. Later Henry Dunlap was given charge of the office. William Hammersley succeeded him to the office, which was then moved to the Vernator ranch. J. W. Howard later purchased the stock of goods of Mr. Hagerhorst, and when the town of Lakeview came into existence, he moved the store building, and all to the new town. The postoffice was discontinued when the Lakeview office was started in 1876.

Our story has now been brought up to the year 1874, the year the legislature authorized the creation of Lake county. In a previous chapter of this work we have told of the creation of Wasco county in 1854 out of all that territory east of the Cascade mountains. This, of course, included the present counties of Lake and Klamath. This latter territory was shortly afterward taken from Wasco county and annexed to Jackson county, the political division lying immediately to the west and on the opposite side of the mountains.

By 1874 the settlers of Jackson county living east of the Cascade mountains thought their country had gained sufficient population and importance to entitle it to set up a county government of its own. The settlers of the Klamath basin, Lost river and Langell's valley were over 100 miles from their county seat, Jacksonville, while the settlers of Goose Lake valley and other settled portions of eastern Jackson county were from 200 to 300 miles from their seat of government. Separating the eastern part of the county from the western was the Cascade range of mountains. Intervening between the county capital and these interior settlements were mountains, lakes and a very rough country in which the roads were an abomination. The time was ripe for the formation of a new county. In this country, including the present counties of Lake and Klamath, lived, probably, 800 or 900 people, the census taken the following year showing a population of 944.

D. W. Cheesman, a resident of the country which it was desired to cut off, was Jackson county's representative in the Oregon legislature and it was he who introduced the bill and worked for the passage of the act. Petitions were sent in from the settlements of the future Lake county asking for the creation of county to be called Crook, taking in all of Jackson county east of the Cascade mountains. It was the almost unanimous desire of the settlers that the proposed new county be called Crook in honor of General Crook, the peerless Indian fighter. Notwithstanding this fact, Mr. Cheesman introduced the bill with the proposed name of Lake and as such it became a law. A few years later the legislature created a county from a part of Wasco and named it in honor of General Crook. The name Lake is a very appropriate one, on account of the many and large lakes that occupy a considerable portion of its surface.

On October 24, 1874, the bill for the creation of Lake county was approved by Governor Grover and became a law. Following is the full text of the bill:

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon:

Section 1. That all that portion of the state of Oregon embraced within the following boundary lines be, and the same is hereby created and organized into a separate county by the name of Lake: Beginning on the forty-second parallel of north latitude at a point where said parallel is intersected by the east boundary of township number 23 east of the Willamette meridian; thence due north on said township line to the south boundary line of township number 22 south of the Oregon base line; thence due west on said township line to the east boundary of Lane county; thence southerly along said boundary line and the east boundary line of Douglas county to the southeast corner of said Douglas county; thence to and south on the east boundary of township number 4 east of the Willamette meridian to said forty-second parallel of north latitude; thence due east along said parallel to the place of beginning.

Sec. 2. The territory embraced within said boundary lines shall compose a county for all civil and military purposes, and shall be subject to the same laws and restrictions, and be entitled to elect the same officers, as other counties of this state. Provided, That it shall be the duty of the governor, as soon as convenient after this act shall become a law, to appoint for Lake county, and from among her resident citizens, the several county officers allowed by law to other counties of this state, which said officers, after duly qualifying according to law, shall be entitled to hold their respective offices until their successors are duly elected, at the general election of 1876, and have duly qualified as required by law.

Sec. 3. The temporary county seat of Lake county shall be located at Linkville, in said county, until a permanent location is adopted. At the next general election the question shall be submitted to the legal voters of said county, and the place, if any, which shall receive a majority of all the votes cast at said election, shall be the permanent county seat of said county, but if no place shall receive a majority of all the votes cast, the question shall be again submitted to the legal voters of said county, between the two points having the highest number of votes at said election, at the next general election, and the place receiving the highest number of votes at such election, shall be the permanent county seat of said county.

Sec. 4. The legal electors of Lake county shall be entitled to elect, at the general election of 1876, and thereafter until otherwise provided by law, one member of the house of representatives, while the county of Jackson shall be entitled to elect but two, and said county for senatorial purposes, be annexed to the 16th senatorial district.

Sec. 5. The county clerk of Jackson county shall send to the county clerk of Lake county, within 30 days after this act becomes a law, a certified transcript of all delinquent taxes from the assessment roll of 1874 that were assessed within the limits of Lake county, and also a certified transcript of the assessment of persons and property within the limits of Lake county for 1874, and the said taxes shall be payable to the proper officers of Lake county. The county treasurer of Lake county shall, out of the first money collected for taxes, pay over to the treasurer of Jackson county the full amount of the state tax on the assessment roll of 1874 due from citizens of Lake county; the said clerk of Jackson county shall also make out and send to the clerk of Lake county, within the time above limited, a transcript of all cases pending in the county and circuit courts of Jackson county between parties residing in Lake county, and transfer all original papers in said cases to be tried in Lake county.

Sec. 6. The said county of Lake is hereby attached to the first judicial district for judicial purposes, and the term of the circuit court of said district shall be held annually, at the county seat of Lake county, on the fourth Monday of June and November, in each year until otherwise provided for.

Sec. 7. The county court of Lake county shall be held at the county seat of said county on the first Monday of every alternate month, beginning on the first Monday of the month next after the appointment by the governor of county officers, as provided for in this act.

Sec. 8. Until otherwise provided for, the county judge of Lake county shall receive an annual salary of $300.

Sec. 9. The county treasurer of Lake county shall receive an annual salary of $100.

Approved October 24, 1874.

By tracing on the map the boundaries as described in the enabling act, it will be seen that the county did not take in the Warner valley country. This was later added to Lake county, being taken from Grant county in 1885. This addition to the county will be treated more fully in its chronological order.

On Monday, February 1, 1875, the county of Lake as a separate political division came into existence. On that day there met at the house of George Nurse in the town of Linkville, which was named in the act as the temporary county seat, E. C. Mason, county judge; Henry Fuller, county commissioner; William Roberts, clerk; and Thos. Mulholland, sheriff, who took the oaths of office and proceeded to organize the county of Lake. W. J. Small, deputy clerk, was also present and recorded the doings of the county court.

Thus the county began its existence, with a territory of many thousand square miles and with less than one thousand inhabitants. According to the census taken during the summer of 1875, there were 944 residents in the new county. At a special election held on October 25 of the same year there were only 210 votes cast. This hardly represented the voting strength of the county, however. The election was for the choosing of a congressman, in which not much interest was taken, and not nearly a whole vote was polled.

Until the closing days of 1876 the county seat of Lake county was at the little town of Linkville, now known as Klamath Falls, then the only town in the whole 11,000 or 12,000 square miles which comprised the county. A building was rented from William Angle as a place for conducting county business, and in this little building what little official business was required was done.

For the year 1875 the county court made a tax levy of twenty mills on the dollar. Of this six and one-half mills was for state purposes, eleven and one-half mills for county purposes, and two mills for school purposes.

The county's first assessment was made in 1875, and the total taxable property was found to be $469,334. Tax was collected on 249 polls. There were 13,088 acres of land assessed, which was returned at a total value of $32,081, or about $2.45 per acre. In addition to this there was placed on the rolls 297,975 acres of wagon road land, assessed at $119,190, or 40 cents per acre. The total value of town lots was placed at $300. Other items on the roll were: Improvements, $32,171; merchandise and implements, $35,341; money, notes, etc., $56,194; household furniture, carriages, watches, etc., $6,993; 2,841 horses and mules, $69,640—average value, $23.46; 22,030 cattle, $220,056—average value $9.99; 20,148 sheep, $40,296—average value, $2.00; 739 swine, 1,500—average value, $2.03. This made the gross value of property $613,762. The indebtedness was $82,824 and exemptions $61,604, leaving a total taxable valuation of $469,334.

On the first assessment roll were 201 names for the precincts which compose the present Lake county, and 164 for the precincts composing the present Klamath county. Following are the names of the taxpayers in the precincts of the present Lake county and the gross value of all their property as assessed. The names of those with no amount following were assessed only for their polls. Some few of the others had sufficient indebtedness or had exemptions, so that they had no taxes to pay except the poll tax. The amounts given are the gross valuations and not the net:

In 1876 the county seat of Lake county was moved from Linkville to Lakeview. It will be remembered that the enabling act provided for the location of the temporary county seat at Linkville; that at the general June election of 1876, the selection of the permanent seat of government should be made by the voters; and that if no place then received a majority of all the votes cast, the question should again be submitted at the next general election, the two places having the largest votes at the preceding election to be the only candidates.

When in 1874 the legislature named Linkville—the present Klamath Falls—as the temporary county seat, that was the only town in the whole territory named as Lake county. Although this little town in the western portion of the new county was the only one, the greater population was in the eastern part of the county—in Goose Lake, Summer Lake, Chewaucan and other valleys. The first assessment roll, as previously stated, showed 201 names in the eastern to 164 in the western part of the county. Having the bulk of the population, the east siders laid their plans to secure the county seat.

No town had yet been builded on the east side, but the settlers decided on "Bullard's Creek," or "Bullard's Ranch," as the place for which to vote for the removal, and preparations were made to build a town at this point. So early as April the store building of A. & C. U. Snider was started, and before the election in June, several other enterprises were under way. This town was being started at "Bullard's Creek," the present site of the town of Lakeview, although that name had not yet been applied to the place. The history of the town of Lakeview will be told in a later chapter, so we shall not here tell more of the building of the town.

The election was held on June 5, and 384 votes were cast on the county seat question. As is usual in cases where votes are cast for a place without a definite name, the vote for "Bullard's Creek" was divided as to the designation of the place, but evidently with unanimity as to intention. The votes cast for "Bullard's Creek," "Goose Lake," "Goose Lake Valley," "Bullard's Ranch," and "Bullard's Creek in Goose Lake Valley" were 193, a slight majority of all the votes cast. The vote by precincts at this election was as follows:

As might naturally be expected, trouble arose over the election. Fraud was alleged in the canvass of the votes. The east side people contended that the plain intention of the voters was to designate Bullard's Creek as the county seat, while those living in the present Klamath county maintained that it was not clear that the intention of the voters voting "Goose Lake," "Goose Lake Valley," etc., was to select "Bullard's Creek," and they contended that no majority had been received and that therefore the county seat should remain at Linkville until the next general election should be held and the contest finally decided.

A majority of the county court was favorable to the east side and ordered the county records removed to Mr. Bullard's ranch in Goose Lake valley. R. B. Hatton, the county clerk, was a Linkville man, however, and refused to remove the records in accordance with the court's instructions. Following is the official action taken by the county court at a session held on August 10:

Whereas an election was held on the 5th day of June, A. D., 1876, in accordance with an act of the legislative assembly of the state of Oregon, 1874, creating Lake county, and fixing the salaries of county judge and treasurer.

It appearing from the poll books returned from the various precincts of Lake county that Bullard's Creek did receive a majority of all the votes cast at said election for the county seat of Lake county as provided for in said act.

And that whereas Bullard's Creek and Bullard's Ranch, two names used in voting for said county seat, does appear from evidence, and the knowledge of this court, and that it was understood by all who voted, that Bullard's Creek and Bullard's Ranch are both one and the same identical place, and from a careful examination of the poll books returned from various precincts, it appearing that a wrong, intentionally or otherwise, has been done a majority of the people of Lake county, that the abstracts are false, and that a majority of the legal voters of Lake county have decided by their votes that Bullard's Creek is rightfully and legally the county seat of Lake county, Bullard's Creek in Goose Lake valley did receive 202 votes, Bullard's Creek and ranch being the same place, leaving a majority for Bullard's Creek of 45 votes, and then counting 17 votes from Silver Lake against Bullard's Creek, it then leaves a majority of 11 votes in favor of Bullard's Creek.

This court is satisfied from evidence adduced that the 17 votes from Silver Lake reported by the board of canvassers of the vote of election declaring 17 votes from Silver Lake to be for Goose Lake, were not so voted, but were voted for Bullard's Creek, as is clearly proven.

It appearing to the satisfaction of this court that there is no such place as Blank, and that it was intended to cheat and defraud the people of their rights at the polls; in view of all the facts that Bullard's Creek is the county seat of Lake county, and the clerk of Lake county, R. B. Hatton, is requested and instructed to select two justices of the peace, or the county judge for one, and to proceed to recount the votes on the poll books, in conjunction with the duplicate poll book of Silver Lake, which explains the blots and errors in the poll book of said precinct of Silver Lake, and to make out a true and perfect abstract of the same, and that he forward a copy of it to the governor of Oregon as required by law; and that the clerk immediately thereafter, within five days from this time, remove the books, papers and records of his office to Bullard's house at Bullard's Creek, in Lake county, Oregon, and that the expenses of the same be paid by Lake county.

Done in open court August 10, 1876.

Chairman Board of County Commissioners, of Lake County.

Anticipating the refusal of Mr. Hatton to comply with the court's orders, that body took further action the same day as follows:

The clerk having intimated that he would not remove his office to Bullard's, it is hereby ordered that if he neglects to do so within five days from this date, it is ordered that H. K. Hanna, district attorney, B. F. Dowell and William Harris commence suit immediately in the name of Lake county, an action or actions at law, suit or suits in equity, mandamus, or any attachment or proceeding against the said clerk that they may deem necessary to compel the said clerk to remove the books, papers, records of his office, to Bullard's house at Bullard's Creek in said county, and that said attorneys be authorized to employ one or more agents, attorneys, to collect the evidence and assist in the perfection of said action or suit.

Done in open court August 10, 1876.

(Signed) E. C. MASON,

of Lake County.

Although this radical step was demanded by the county court, it was not carried out; neither did Mr. Hatton remove the records. The east side people believed that they could easily carry the election, which was to be held November 7, and waited their time. In the meantime Lakeview had come into existence and been given a name, and there was no danger that the mistakes of the June election would be repeated. Four hundred eighty-three votes were cast, 181 for Linkville and 242 for Lakeview.

Linkville put up a hard fight at this election, and a number of her emissaries invaded the territory of the enemy. It is said that some of these carried "long sacks" containing the wherewithal to secure votes for Linkville from Goose Lake valley. The result shows that but little was accomplished by these tactics.

One incident is told by Mr. J. T. Fitzgerald of an attempt to secure a vote for Linkville from a resident of Summer Lake valley by a Linkville man. The occurrence was on election day at the polls at Hagerhorst's store. C. Hayes, who made his home at Summer Lake, was present and intended to vote for the location of the county seat on the east side of the county. Mr. Hayes could neither read nor write. The Linkville worker approached him and found that Mr. Hayes claimed to be a relative of Rutherford B. Hayes, on that day elected president of the United States, and proceeded to establish a confidential acquaintance with Mr. Hayes by praising the distinguished relative. At the right time the Linkville emissary approached Hayes on the election and proposed to fix the ticket for him. He was allowed to "fix it," but as soon as the ballot fixer left his man, Mr. Fitzgerald, who had been watching the performance, went to George Whiteaker and told him what he had seen. Mr. Whiteaker met Mr. Hayes on his way to the polls and asked him if he had voted, to which Hayes replied, "No; I am going to vote now." Mr. Whiteaker asked him to let him see his ticket. Mr. Hayes produced the "fixed" ticket and Mr. Whiteaker read it. "Why," said he, "you don't want to vote for Linkville, do you?" Mr. Hayes:

replied that he certainly did not. And then Mr. Whiteaker seized the opportunity to "fix" the ticket, and Mr. Hayes was hurried off to the polls and voted "Lakeview."

The official vote by precincts was as follows:

	Eagle Point	Goose Lake	Chewaucan	Summer Lake	Silver Lake	Crooked Creek	Sprague River	Lost River	Linkville	Total
Linkville	5	4	..	..	5	..	..	50	117	181
Lakeview	104	14	25	29	29	17	11	8	5	242

The westsiders then gave up the fight. However, they began to lay their plans for the division of the county so soon as the population would warrant. Their desires were not brought about until 1882.

Soon after the election the records were removed to Lakeview and that city has ever since been the county seat. The first session of the county court was held on December 6, 1876, and there were present E. C. Mason, county judge; Stephen Moss and A. Tenbrook, county commissioners; T. J. Brattain, sheriff; and R. B. Hattan, clerk.

When the county seat was moved to Lakeview in 1876 M. W. Bullard donated twenty acres of land to Lake county for county purposes, and a part of this, after the platting of Lakeview, was sold to private parties in town lots.

Arrangements were soon made to erect a building for a clerk's office at the new county seat. December 9, 1876, the county court authorized the erection of a 16x28 foot building, and Milton Brown was appointed to supervise its erection and procure material and help with which to erect it. This was soon completed, but it was not until 1881 that the county had what might be properly called a court house. A county jail was the next thing in order and at a special session of the county court on April 14, 1877, a contract was let to S. J. Hickman for $130, and in a short time this was completed.

As is often the case where a new political division is set off from the parent county, litigation arose between Jackson and Lake counties over a settlement. This was in two suits—one, Jackson County vs. Lake County, for the recovery of $423.68; the other, John Orth, Treasurer of Jackson County, vs. George Nurse, Treasurer of Lake County, for the recovery of $1,066.18.

The first named case was brought about in this way: Some time in 1874, before Lake county was created, a murder was committed in the territory afterwards set off as Lake county. The alleged murderer was arrested and confined in the county jail at Jacksonville before the new county was created. After the organization of Lake county the prisoner was tried at Jacksonville and the costs of the trial paid by the old county. Jackson county demanded payment from Lake county for the costs of the trial, which was refused. Lake county put in a counter claim, alleging it had money due in final settlement with the older county.

The suits were brought in 1877 and extended litigation seemed probable. In view of this fact, on June 7, 1877, the county court submitted a proposition to settle the matter by arbitration. It suggested that Jackson county should withdraw all actions it had begun at law, and that the decision by the board of arbitration should be binding upon both parties; that the arbitration board should consist of three members, one chosen by Lake county, one by Jackson, and the third to be selected by the other two; that the board hold its meetings at Ashland, Jackson county. The offer was refused by the county court of Jackson county and the suits were pressed. Lake county employed A. C. Jones and G. F. Harris as attorneys to represent it.

The cases were tried in the circuit court for Lake county before Judge Prim, who, on November 20, 1877, decided both cases in favor of the plaintiffs, giving the judgments asked for. On January 24, 1878, both cases were appealed to the supreme court and A. C. Jones and R. S. Strahn were selected as Lake county's attorneys to conduct the cases before that tribunal. On January 6, 1879, the supreme court ordered the appeal dismissed, that Jackson county recover from Lake county the costs of the suits, and that the cases be remanded to the lower court for further proceeding. The cases finally went against Lake county, and on April 8, 1881, a warrant was ordered drawn for $663.88 in favor of Jackson county, a final settlement of the case.

During the first five years of the county's existence there was a rapid settlement, and where in 1875 there were 944 people we find in 1880 that there are 2,804, nearly three times as many. The population was divided into the several precincts as follows:

Chewaucan	179
Crooked Creek	83
Goose Lake, Lakeview and New Pine Creek	936
Linkville	737
Lost River	374
Plevna	139
Silver Lake	92
Sprague River	118
Summer Lake	146
Total	2,804

Of these, 2,722 were whites, three colored, seven Chinese, and twenty-seven Indians. The native born population was 2,575; foreign born, 229. The precincts which were two years later set off as Klamath county contained 1,368 of this number, leaving 1,436 in the present Lake county.

Other statistics from the census of 1880 are interesting because they show the condition of the county at that time:

Number of farms, 347; number of owners, 237; number rented for money, 6; number rented for shares, 15. Acres tilled, including fallow and grass in rotation, 9,691. Number of acres of permanent meadows, pastures and orchards, 33,312.

Value of lands, fences and buildings, $430,025; value of farm implements and machinery, $48,630; value of live stock, $506,201; amount paid for wages, $40,633; grass lands mown, 11,844; tons of hay, 12,651; number of horses, 5,318; mules, 224; oxen, 97; milch cows, 1,405; other cattle, 31,342; sheep, 25,809; swine, 679; pounds of butter made, 53,315; cheese, 2,550. Estimated value of farm productions, $225,971. Acres of wheat, 611; bushels, 9,635. Acres of oats, 332; bushels, 7,031. Acres of potatoes, 49; bushels, 5,299. Acres of barley, 731; bushels, 18,215. Acres of apple orchard, 27; bearing trees, 83; bushels, 66. Total value of all orchard products, $75; market vegetables, $1,995.

In 1881 the county purchased a building for $1,600 from George Conn, moved it onto the county property, and on June 11 of that year let the contract to N. A. Clark for $965, to make additions and complete a court house. When this was completed Lake county had a court house, the one which is still used for that purpose.

In 1881 the county purchased a building for Klamath county from the western portion of Lake county. This took off about one-half of the county as it was at that time. Ever since the removal of the county seat to Lakeview in 1876, the people of the Klamath country had been determined to have this county formed. Agitation was begun before the 1880 session of the legislature, but at that time the population and assessed valuation of their country would not warrant such a step, and the agitation did not reach the stage of having a bill introduced in the legislature. During the next two years the question was a live one, and the separation was accomplished in 1882.

While this legislation cut down the dimensions of the county to a considerable extent, it was only a few years later that a generous slice of territory was added to the county. By 1885 Warner valley, which at that time was a portion of Grant county, had become settled to some extent. The county seat of Grant county was Canyon City, half way across the state, and naturally this fact was a source of great inconvenience to the Warner valley settlers. All their relations, except official, were with Lakeview, which was comparatively only a short distance away, about thirty or forty miles, and it was only natural that they should desire to have their valley annexed to Lake county. Agitation was begun in 1882, but results were not obtained until three years later. The annexation was made by the legislature of 1885, the bill being introduced by W. F. Abshier, representative from Lake county. The bill as passed was as follows:

Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the state of Oregon.

Section 1. That all that portion of Grant county lying within the following described boundaries, to-wit: Beginning where the north boundary line of township 33 south intersects the east line of Lake county, thence east along said township line to the northeast corner of township 33 south, of range 28 east, thence south along said range line to the south boundary line of the state of Oregon, thence west along said line to the southeast corner of Lake county, thence north along the east boundary line of Lake county to the place of beginning; be, and the same is hereby, taken from said Grant county and annexed to and made a part of Lake county.

Sec. 2. The treasurer of Lake county shall pay to the treasurer of Grant county such a portion of the indebtedness of Grant county as the taxable property of the territory described in section one bears to the whole amount of taxable property of said Grant county not to exceed five thousand dollars, as said taxable property appears by the assessor's roll of 1884.

Sec. 3. Inasmuch as the boundary lines as they now exist between the counties of Grant and Lake are a source of great inconvenience to many citizens, this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval by the governor.

The bill passed both houses of the legislature and was approved by the governor on November 21, 1885. This added a generous slice of territory to Lake county, and proved a great convenience to the Warner valley settlers.

The annexation of Warner valley brought about a suit between Grant and Lake counties. On August 3, 1887, Grant county commenced an action to recover the amount due by virtue of section 2 of the act of 1885. The suit was for $4,298.82, the amount claimed as the Warner valley share of Grant county's indebtedness according to the taxable property. The case was brought to trial in the circuit court for Lake county at the June term in 1888. The court gave Grant county judgment for $483 with interest at eight per cent. from November 21, 1885. From this decision both parties took an appeal to the supreme court, which remanded the case to the circuit court with instructions to render judgment against Lake county for $4,298.82, without interest. The opinion was rendered by Judge Thayer May 8, 1889.

According to the state census of 1885 Lake county had a population of 1536. This was before the Warner valley country had been added to the county, but after Klamath had been set off. The federal census of 1880 had given the county a population of 2,807, when Klamath was included. The increase in the county with its new dimensions during the five years was not large, being just about 100.

During the latter part of the eighties a few new settlers came into the county, but very little of importance transpired during these years. The census of 1890 gave the county a population of 2,585. At that time there were only five counties in Oregon having a smaller population.

The even tenor of the ways of Lake county was marred in 1894 by a lynching at Lakeview, the first and last that has taken place in the county's history. On Monday morning, August 20, about one o'clock, W. S. Thompson was taken from the jail at Lakeview and hanged, it was generally believed, by residents of Warner valley. He was taken from the jail by a number of masked men who had previously held up acting nightwatchman Heminger, and secured the keys of the jail.

Thompson lived in Warner valley and was known as a desperado. He was in jail at the time, charged with the crime of drawing a gun on several Warner valley citizens. It was not for this offense that the lynchers demanded the life of Thompson; it seems to have been the almost unanimous opinion that the man should be hung on general principles. The day before the hanging he had indulged himself to the extent of smashing his wife's nose, breaking three of her ribs, cutting to death her saddle horse and ripping open the abdomens of a few other horses in the barnyard. A coroner's jury found that Thompson came to his death by strangulation at the hands of unknown parties.

While the lynching was deplored by the citizens of Lake county in general, they realized that the community was much better off than it would have been had the crime not been committed.

During the financial depression of the nineties Lake county made little advancement. Being a stock raising country, it did not receive the setback which the agricultural districts of our country suffered owing to the low price of cereals. The depression was hard enough, however, to retard the county to a considerable extent. The taxable property in the county in 1894 was $1,388,409, and according to the census of 1895 the county's population was 2,197, a loss in the five years.

After the hard times period Lake county came to the front again, and during the late nineties and the first few years of the 20th century the development was the greatest in its history.

The year 1899 was an exceptionally good one. On January 1, 1900, Beach & McGarry, then publishers of the Lake County Examiner, wrote of the preceding year as follows:

"Lake county in 1899 enjoyed a degree of prosperity never before known in its history. It might be said that 1899 was a banner year for the stock industry, for agricultural and horticultural development and for numerous industrial enterprises. Every industry has shown a material increase and every one is prosperous. The sale and shipment of about 35,000 head of beef cattle brought into the county nearly $1,000,000. On 75,000 head of sheep driven to market $225,000 more was added to the Lake county stockman's income. One million, five hundred thousand pounds of wool were sheared and shipped. Last year's product brought the sheepmen $195,000. Besides sales of cattle, sheep and wool, there were sold from 1,500 to 2,000 head of horses and mules, valued at from $25,000 to $40,000; also 1,000 to 1,500 hogs for $90,000 and 2,500 goats for $7,500, making a total of $1,460,000 received from stock.

"The sawmills of the county were not able to supply the demand for lumber last year, notwithstanding that they turned out over 1,250,000 feet, valued at $20,000. The number of buildings erected last year was nearly double the number of any former year, and the indications are favorable for greater building in 1900. New farm-houses, barns and fences are good indications of the prosperity of the farmers. Nearly every one in the county made improvements of some kind during the year.

"Immigration to Lake county, while not large, has been steady, and the increase in population is quite perceptible."

Nineteen hundred was another prosperous year. In the spring immigrants began to come in from all parts of the country. The county's resources were becoming known to the outside world, and the outside world was beginning to investigate.

The federal census taken that year showed 2,847 people in the county, a gain of 243 in ten years. Only three counties, Curry, Harney and Wheeler, had less population. By precincts the population was:

The total taxable property for 1900 was $1,546,916, an increase of $81,000 over 1899. By 1903 the valuation had reached a figure of $724,507, a gain of $150,000 over the preceding year. In 1904 the valuation had increased to $2,068,696. In the county were assessed that year 136,003 acres of tillable land, valued at $402,146, and 371,156 acres of non-tillable land, valued at $446,238. Stock was assessed as follows: 5,011 horses and mules, $61,890; 23,716 cattle, $355,740; 139,887 sheep, $279,774; 373 swine, $749.

The year 1904 witnessed the breaking out of the range war in Lake county. The county, devoted almost exclusively to stock raising, during all the years of its history had never been the scene of any trouble over range matters, and the events of the year 1904 are deplored by all fair minded citizens. Since 1904 there has been no repetition of the troubles and it is safe to say that there will not be.

As usual in range wars, the sheep men were the losers, and the trouble started with the slaughter of sheep. The killing took place near Christmas lake in the "desert" country, far from the inhabited portions of the county. Christmas lake is situated about twenty miles east and twelve miles north of Silver lake, and is nearly in the center of what is known as the "great Oregon desert." We shall not undertake here to describe the desert country, as a description of it will be found elsewhere in this history, but we shall endeavor to picture briefly particular localities which were the scenes of the sheep slaughters. The particular locality of Christmas lake is a rough sagebrush plain, cut up by rim-rocks and ridges covered with scrubby juniper timber. Standing upon one of the high points of these ridges or rim-rocks, one can see for miles around; drop down into a valley or ravine, and you are sheltered from storms. At many places on the desert almost complete enclosures can be found, where sheepmen with a little work can make corrals by piling rock and brush across gaps in the rim-rock and pitching camp in an outlet. In some instances these enclosures cover several acres of ground.

It was in one of these enclosures that a band of sheep, most of which belonged to Benham Brothers, was corralled on the evening of February 3, 1904. No sooner had the herder corralled his sheep than five masked men rode up to him, emerging from a hiding place near by, where they had evidently awaited this opportunity, compelled him to stand with his arms up and his back to the crowd while they placed a sack over his face and tied his hands. He was then compelled to stand by a juniper trees, while, with rifles, pistols, knives and clubs, the clubs being juniper limbs about four feet long and the size of a man's wrist, the masked men proceeded to slaughter sheep.

There were in the neighborhood of 3,000 head in the flock. It was just getting dark when the slaughter commenced, and it took nearly all night to complete the job. The sheep stampeded and about 800 escaped the deadly onslaught, but many of these escaped the men, only to fall a prey to the predatory coyote. When the men had completed their job, they returned to the herder and told him what they had done, and warned him that other sheep found grazing on certain range would be treated the same way. They also stated that they had drawn dead lines, and that it was death to all sheep crossing them.

The men rode away, leaving the herder to contemplate the situation. Not, however, until they had cautioned him about "talking too much." The herder struck out at once for Silver Lake to give the news. He reached the town of Silver Lake late the next day and telephoned to Lakeview, a hundred miles away. Before an officer could reach the spot three days had elapsed and no trace of the perpetrators could be found.

A quiet investigation was carried on for some time. Men who were thought to be in possession of evidence received letters and warning in various ways, cautioning them to be careful what they said. One morning when one of the merchants of Silver Lake went to open his store he found a small piece of rope tied to the door knob and a note advising him to "keep quiet." All these warnings came from mysterious sources; some of the letters were mailed at distant post-offices, and no clue could be safely traced. The whole thong was a mystery, as it was generally believed that the sheep men and cattle men were on good terms, and it seemed impossible that the range war that had been a common thing in the counties farther north had begun in Lake county.

Time wore on, and finally J. C. Conn, a merchant of Silver Lake, lost a valuable string of freight wagons by fire. Mr. Conn, while very reticent about the subject, showed evidence of his belief that parties connected with the sheep killing were punishing him for the leaking out of some facts connected with the sheep killing. He went to Lakeview and remained a few days. He acted very nervous about the affair, but said little.

On Friday morning, March 4, 1904, J. C. Conn ate his breakfast, went to the store, asked the clerk if he had got the mail, and then walked out. He went out along the road and was seen about a mile from town later in the morning. Mr. Conn did not return. Searching parties were sent out, but no track or trace of the lost man could be found. The creek, which at that time was running high, was dragged for miles up and down; parties scattered farther and farther out, but no sign could be found. More men were sent out; day after day and week after week passed and still no trace of the lost man. It was believed that every foot of country had been searched and the mystery grew deeper. Six weeks after Conn's disappearance a vaquero found his dead body lying in a field about a mile from the town and a quarter of a mile from the road leading north and west from Silver Lake. This was on April 25. The verdict of the coroner's jury, composed mostly of stockmen in the vicinity of Silver Lake, was to the effect that Mr. Conn came to his death by gunshot wounds self-inflicted. The body was lying on the ground, face up, arms outstretched, and Conn's revolver lying by his side. The body at first sight seemed to be in a fair state of preservation, but upon examination it was found to be badly decomposed. Two bullet holes were in the breast and one in the back; one bullet had passed through the body and was found a few inches under the surface of the ground. Regardless of the verdict of the coroner's jury, there were some who held out the belief that Conn was murdered.

On the 29th of April another band of sheep was raided some twenty or thirty miles from the scene of the first slaughter, but on the same range, and out of a band of 2,700 head, about 300 or 400 were all that could be found. Several sheepmen who had wintered their flocks on the desert had driven their ewe bands to the valley for lambing purposes, and for convenience and economy had put their weathers all together and left a Mr. Wilcox in charge of the band. Wilcox, in relating the story of the slaughter, said:

"About four o'clock on the evening of April 29 nine men on horseback came upon me when I was heading the sheep for the corrals. The men were all heavily armed and masked. They said unless I removed the sheep in two hours they would kill them, and then they left me. It was then nearly time for sheep to bed, and it was absolutely out of the question to move them that day, so I proceeded to corral them, thinking probably they would not molest me that night. My expectations were not to be realized, however, for in two hours the men came back, and after placing a sack over my face and tying my hands, they told me they had come to kill the sheep and if officers came to arrest them they would treat the officers the same way, also that if any one offered a reward for their arrest they would kill the parties offering the reward. They were very deliberate in their work and went about it just as if it were an every day occurrence."

Wilcox reported this killing at Silver Lake as soon as he could reach there, and men were sent out to investigate, but the results were the same as those of the earlier slaughter.

The governor of Oregon was appealed to and, although he refused at first, he finally offered a reward of $300 for the conviction of any one of the gang of sheep killers and $2,000 reward for the murderer of J. C. Conn. The sheepmen of the county got together and formed an organization. They offered a reward of $2,000 for the conviction of any party guilty of maliciously killing sheep belonging to any member of the organization. The county court also offered a reward for the capture of the parties who killed the sheep. No arrests were made, although information was filed against several unknown parties. In the state legislature of 1904-5, as a result of the Lake county range war, two bills were introduced for the protection of range stock. One was for the appropriation of $10,000 and empowering the governor to use the money in apprehending and punishing persons guilty of maliciously killing stock belonging to others. The other bill was one making counties and municipalities responsible for the destruction of live stock to the amount of one-half the value of the stock destroyed. The former bill passed, but the latter was defeated in the senate.

The people of Lake county and of the whole of the stock country of Eastern Oregon are law abiding citizens, and the malicious deeds of the few who took part in the sheep killing episodes are not upheld by them.

In the spring of 1905 Lake county got out of debt, a condition which had not existed in the county's history for seventeen years. Three years before the county had outstanding and unpaid an indebtedness of $63,000. The statement of the compilation of the state tax levy for the year 1905, as compiled by the governor, state treasurer and secretary of state, showed a reduction in Lake county's portion of $2,140 under the levy for 1904. Lake's portion for 1905 was $10,967.50 against $13,107.50 for 1904. A reduction of

$2,140 in the state taxes and a small reduction in county taxes placed Lake county in pretty good shape financially, and the further promise of a still greater reduction in taxes for 1906, by reason of the county getting out of debt in April, 1905, is great encouragement to the people. With no interest to pay and an economical conduct of the county's affairs there will be an attraction for outside capital that is never overlooked by investors.

Based on the number of children enrolled in the public schools, an estimate of the population of the county for 1905 is made at 3,011. With this population Lake county disputes the claim of Crook county to being the richest county in Oregon per capita. If Lake does not rank first in this particular, it certainly is a close second.

CHAPTER III

THE LAND GRABBERS.

There have been two events in the history of Lake county which we have as yet failed to mention in the current history chapters. This is because they have both covered periods of time from the earliest days of the county's history up to the present time and are entitled a separate chapter. They are the granting of a large tract of alleged swamp land in Warner valley and the subsequent litigation for the possession of the same, and the grant of about 40,000 acres of Lake county land to the Oregon Central Military Wagon Road Company and the alleged building of a wagon road by that company through Southern Oregon.

The first of these is the more important. Undoubtedly the prolonged litigation for the possession of the Warner valley lands between the settlers and the Warner Valley Stock Company is one of the most interesting events that has taken place in the county. Oregon is the breeding place of contests for the possession of government and state lands, and the Warner valley cases are the most noted of all that have arisen in the state. The contest has not yet been brought to a close and it is reasonable to believe that no decision will be considered final until one is handed down by the United States supreme court. The contest is for the possession of from 4,000 to 5,000 acres of valuable land, it being worth from $35 to $100 per acre. Litigation has extended over a period of more than twenty years, and while the last decision was favorable to the stock company, the case has been appealed to the Oregon supreme court and will probably be fought out in the highest court of the land.

Before beginning the history of this noted case we wish to tell of the effect it has had upon Lake county and the part it has played in the shaping of the county's history. It is not our intention to make this a treatise of the case from the standpoint of either party to the controversy, but to give the facts as we find them. The case has been decided several times in favor of each party by people higher in authority than the author, and we hope to leave it in such a condition that the higher courts can decide it finally with minds unprejudiced by anything that may appear herein.

But the fact remains that the failure of the Warner valley settlers to obtain title to the lands upon which they live has been detrimental to the county whose history we are writing. It has retarded immigration to the rich valley in question and has forced many who attempted to build homes there to vacate. It has caused a valley, by nature intended for the small farmer and stock raiser, to be the range ground for a large stock company. It has left a section of the county, capable of supporting a large population, but sparsely settled. The few settlers upon these lands who have fought for what they believe to be their rights have built homes, raised families, established schools, paid taxes and made valuable improvements. This they wish to continue to do and to encourage others to come and settle among them as neighbors. On the other hand, a great stock company desires the valley for a stock range. It does not take the decision of a court to show which would be the better condition for Lake county and its inhabitants.

The history of the Warner valley case began years ago. On September 28, 1850, congress passed an act granting to the several states the swamp lands within their borders. Oregon was not then a state and this act did not apply to any lands within the boundaries of Oregon. On March 12, 1860, this act was applied to Oregon, which had the year before been admitted to statehood, and to Minnesota. The act provided that all "swamp and overflowed" lands should become the property of the state in which they were situated.

The state of Oregon made no effort to dispose of such lands, nor was any attempt made by private parties to secure them, until 1870. That part of Oregon in which there were swamp lands was not settled to any extent until the late sixties, and consequently the swamp lands, as well as most of the other lands, were unoccupied and unclaimed. But in 1870 the Oregon legislature passed a law authorizing its citizens to purchase without limit as to acreage, the lands granted to the state by the act of congress March 12, 1860. Very little of the land of eastern Oregon had been surveyed in 1870, and the character of the land, whether swamp or upland, was not of record in charts or field notes. Because of this arose the dispute between the claimants in Warner valley and other parts of eastern Oregon. The United States had granted to Oregon, and Oregon had authorized the sale at a nominal figure to its citizens, the "swamp and overflowed" lands within the boundaries of the state, but there was no record of what lands were swamp, and the whole controversy during all these later years has hinged on the question of whether the lands in dispute were swamp lands on March 12, 1860, the date of the passage of the bill by congress. On that date there were no settlers in the present Lake county and the facts as to the character of the lands in Warner valley could not be determined by direct proof.

Immediately after the passage of the act by the legislature of 1870, authorizing the sale of swamp lands, individuals and corporations were not slow in filing with the state authorities to purchase all the swamp lands in the state, and, apparently, a large part of the state looked "swampy" to them. Special agent, Charles Shackelford, who was sent out in 1886 by the government to investigate the conditions of the lands in controversy, said concerning the attempts to secure lands from the state immediately after the passage of the bill of 1870, that one named individual, and a few others in secret compact with him, filed with the state board of land commissioners of Oregon to purchase nearly one-half of the state as swamp land; that their filings included mountain ranges, sage brush plains, lava beds, lakes and deserts, surveyed and unsurveyed.

He made direct and specific charges against a number of United States officials, including former special agents, deputy surveyors and local officers, indicating that all these officers were members of the "swamp ring," who, acting conjointly with the agents of the state of Oregon, had made fraudulent returns, reports, etc., in the matter of swamp land surveys, and inspection of the field, selection, etc.

The importance of this report, which has formed the basis for all subsequent action, justifies a further quotation from it, as follows:

"These selections embrace hundreds of thousands of acres of dry, arable land, situate in valleys or on hillsides and mountain ranges, all withdrawn from settlement. Other selections have been made by different parties in the same reckless manner. The chief object appears to have been to secure control of all the water frontage, as well as all approaches to water in eastern Oregon, and to obtain all the grass lands in that section of the state, for the purpose of sales to cattlemen."

As this act of 1870 was responsible for all the litigation in the Warner valley cases, and as under it, as claimed by the special agent, Shackelford, half the state of Oregon was filed upon as swamp lands, we here reproduce the bill in full:

An act providing for the selection and sale of the swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the state of Oregon.

Whereas, Congress, by an act entitled "An Act to extend the provisions of an Act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits, to Minnesota and Oregon and for other purposes, approved Sept. 12, 1860, has granted to this State all the swamp and overflowed lands within its limits; and

Whereas, By the failure of the Secretary of the Interior to notify the Governor of the State that the surveys have been completed and confirmed in accordance with the provisions of said Act, no swamp or overflowed lands have been selected in this State; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon as follows:

Section 1. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Lands to appoint a suitable person or persons as his deputies to proceed as soon as practicable to select in the field all the lands rendered unfit for cultivation by inundation or overflow within this State, and to make return of the same to said Commissioner. And it shall be the duty of such deputies to describe each tract or swamp or overflowed land they may select in a clear or distinct manner, either by legal subdivisions or by actual survey, and upon the receipt of such returns it shall be the duty of said Commissioner to carefully examine the same.

Sec. 2. So soon as the selection of swamp and overflowed lands in any county has been completed by said Commissioner of Lands it shall be the duty of said Commissioner to make out maps and descriptions thereof in duplicate, one copy to be kept in suitable books in his office, and the other to be filed in the office of the County Clerk of the county in which such swamp lands may be located; and it shall be the duty of such County Clerk to forward his official certificate to the Commissioner of the date on which said maps and descriptions were so filed. Upon the receipt of such certificate it shall be the duty of said Commissioner to give public notice of said completion, approval and filing, for four weeks successively in some weekly newspaper published in such county; and if no newspaper is published in such county, then in such newspaper as he may select in an adjoining county.

Sec. 3. The swamp and overflowed lands of this State shall be sold by said Commissioner at a price not less than one dollar per acre in gold coin. Any person over the age of twenty-one years, and being a citizen of the United States, or having filed his declaration to become a citizen, as required by the naturalization laws, may become an applicant for the purchase of any tract or tracts of said swamp or overflowed lands upon filing his application therefor (describing the tract or tracts he desires to purchase), by the actual survey; or, if no survey has been made, then by fences, ditches, monuments, or other artificial landmarks, with said Commissioner, whose duty it shall be to immediately endorse thereon the actual date of such filing. In case of adverse applicants for the same tract or parcel of swamp land, it shall be the duty of said Commissioner to sell the same to the legal applicant therefor whose application is first filed. Within ninety days after the date of the public notice provided in section two of this Act, twenty per centum of the purchase money shall be paid by the applicant to said Commissioner, whose duty it shall be to issue to the applicant a receipt therefor, and the balance of said purchase money shall be paid on proof of reclamation, as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 4. No patent shall be issued to any applicant for any swamp or overflowed lands until the applicant therefor has proved, to the satisfaction of said Commissioner, that the lands for which he claims a patent has been drained or otherwise made fit for cultivation; but upon such proof being made, and payment of the balance of the purchase money on the amount of land actually reclaimed, the said Commissioner shall issue to the applicant making such proof and payment a patent for the land so reclaimed. Said patent shall be approved and signed by the Governor, Secretary of State and State Treasurer, as provided for by the Constitution. At the expiration of ten years from and after his first payment, all swamp lands claimed by an applicant, upon which no such proof of reclamation has been made, shall revert to the State, and the money paid thereon shall be forfeited; Provided, That all swamp land that has been successfully cultivated in either grass, the cereals or vegetables for three years shall be considered as fully reclaimed within the meaning of this Act.

Sec. 5. The deputies employed to select the swamp and overflowed lands, as provided in section one of this Act, shall receive not to exceed five dollars per day for each day actually employed in the discharge of their duties and such further allowance for traveling, assistance and other necessary expenses, as may be ascertained by said Commissioner, which shall be paid as other expenses arising from the management of the State lands.

Sec. 6. As the State is likely to suffer loss by further delay in taking possession of the swamp lands within its limits, this Act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval by the Governor; Provided, That in case the office of Commissioner of Lands is not created by law, the provisions of this Act shall be executed by the Board of Commissioners for the sale of school and university lands.

The lands, for the ownership of which has resulted in the prolonged litigation of which we are telling, are situated in Warner valley, in the southeastern part of Lake county. In the early days these lands were considered unfit for agricultural purposes or for anything but stock raising. Later development showed the section was a rich agricultural valley. The lands were found to be among the most valuable in the county and hence the determined struggle on both sides to secure title. The lands involved are situated in townships 39 S. R. 24 E.; 39 S. R. 25 E.; and 40 S. R. 24 E. W. M. In the early surveys these lands were returned as the bed of Warner lake.

The first survey of lands in Warner valley was made in June, 1875, by James H. Evans. His survey included fractional townships 39 S. R. 24 E. and 39 S. R. 25 E. A large part of the two townships was described and meandered as a lake. The field notes and general description were very meager and gave no light as to the character of the body of water therein spoken of as "Warner lake" and "lake." In July and August, 1879, a survey of township 40 S. R. 24 E. was made by Byars and Gray, in the returns of which a large portion of the township was described as marsh or lake, and was defined by a meander line running through "land marshy along lake covered with tules and flag grass;" "tules in and along lake;" "these lands are subject to overflow by the creek and lake."

White settlers began to come into the valley about the fall of 1876, and some 7,000 or 8,000 head of cattle and several thousand hogs were taken there in the winter of 1876-7, and thenceforward it was a winter range for stock. Although a few settlers came in 1876 there was not much settlement until 1885 and the following few years.

Before taking up the story of the settlement of the valley and the subsequent contests that arose for its possession, let us tell of the acquiring of this land from the state under the swamp land law passed by the legislature of 1870.

That clause in the act making the first filed application the one of preference in case more than one party filed on the same piece of land caused the filing on the Warner valley lands just as soon as the bill became a law and a description of the lands could be secured. This application was made December 2, 1870, by W. A. Owen, A. P. Owen, T. G. Reams, C. C. Beekman and B. F. Smith. It is not possible for us to believe that these parties intended to reclaim this land or to make payment on the purchase price of these lands. Their intention seems to have been, merely, by filing an application, to secure the preference right to purchase and to hold the preference right for speculation.

This interesting application filed with Governor L. F. Grover was as follows:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, and each over the age of twenty-one years, do hereby apply to purchase the following described unsurveyed swamp and overflowed lands situated, lying and being in Grant county [Warner valley was at that time a part of Grant county]: Commencing at "Stone Bridge;" thence west to the road called "Lower Bidwell Road," near foothills; thence in a northeasterly direction to a point of willows on Honey creek and near the sink of said creek; thence north 20 miles, or along foothills on west side of marsh; thence east five miles to or near the east foothills; thence in a southerly direction along east side of marsh and near the foothills to the C. F. Smith military road, east of "Stone Bridge;" thence west to the place of beginning. Also commencing at the "Stone Bridge," south to point of hill; thence west to spring near road; thence south along foothills to springs called "Warner Springs;" thence south along foothills to a large stone, the lower Bidwell road passing on each side of stone; thence along the road, called lower Bidwell road, to and including a lake called "Little Warner," at foot of mountain; still continuing along said road, passing old mail station known as Soldier Camp; still following said road, passing a small alkali lake; still south along said road to a point on Deep creek called "Halfway House;" still southward along said road to a creek with willowy growth on banks; thence eastwardly along line of said marsh, near foothills surrounding same; thence northerly along the line of said marsh of the camp of C. F. Smith military road; thence westerly to the place of beginning, the same intended to include both Lake Warner and Little Warner Deep Creek and all marsh lands surrounding the same.

This application is made under the provisions of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, entitled an act for the selection and sale of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the State of Oregon, approved October 26, 1870.

No tender of money was made with this application and no transfer of the lands asked for was made at this time.

On October 28, 1872, the Oregon legislature passed an act, the substance of which was that any lands which were held by actual settlers under the preemption, homestead or donation laws at the time the application was made by the swamp land claimants should not be included in the lists of lands for which application had been made. Farther, the state agreed to, upon request of the settler and his presentation of sufficient proof, issue a quit claim deed to such lands.

No further effort was made to secure the lands in Warner valley under the swamp act until December 6, 1876, when R. F. and Martin McConnaughy made application to purchase 3,366 acres in township 39. The application was rejected.

Although the applicants had so far failed to secure title to any of the lands in Warner valley, in other parts of the state they were more successful, and the people began to see large tracts of Oregon land passing into the hands of the swamp land claimants. It was seen that a mistake had been made and a vigorous campaign was inaugurated against the land grabbers. The legislature on October 18, 1878, passed an act which limited the sale of state swamp lands to 320 acres to any one person. It also provided that no sales should be made for less than one dollar per acre.

Another provision of the act was that all applications made prior to the passage of the act which were not regularly made in accordance with law, or that applications in which the applicants had not fully complied with the law, including the payment of the twenty per cent. of the purchase price, should be declared void. The same provisions were made in this act as in the one of 1872 to protect the actual settlers under the preemption and other laws for the acquiring of government lands.

Notwithstanding this act of 1878, on September 7, 1881, we find H. C. Owen filing an application to purchase 78,901 acres in township 39, in Warner valley. He tendered payment of the twenty per cent. required for first payment, but the application and tender were both refused, in accordance with the law just mentioned.

October 31, 1882, R. F. and Martin McConnaughy filed another application for the purchase of Warner valley lands. The lands asked for were only a part of those asked for in their first application, being for 902 acres in township 39. Accompanying the applications were affidavits by T. A. Henderson and M. W. Poindexter, dated August 9, 1880, stating that the lands had been reclaimed within the meaning of the provision of the act of 1870. R. F. McConnaughy made affidavit to the same effect and tendered the eighty per cent. balance of the purchase price of the lands. This was accepted and on January 18, 1883, the deed to this land was issued to the McConnaughys—the first land in Warner valley acquired under the swamp act.

H. C. Owen filed his second application on November 5, 1883, this time for the purchase of 63,500 acres of the land embraced in his former application. The tender of the twenty per cent. $12,700, was made and rejected as in the former application and on the same grounds—that one person was not entitled to purchase more than 320 acres from the state.

On March 14, 1884, H. C. Owen filed his third application, this time for 78,901 acres. This time he presented an assignment from W. A. Owen, A. P. Owen, T. G. Reames and C. C. Beekman, who had, with B. F. Smith, filed the very first application covering these lands, in 1870. The board of commissioners for the sale of these lands this time accepted the tender of the first payment of twenty per cent., $15,780.32 and issued a certificate of sale for all the lands applied for. The officials who had twice before rejected the application because of the law of 1878 now made arrangements for the sale of nearly 80,000 acres of Warner valley lands. The state authorities justified their action in this manner: Under the former applications Mr. Owen was entitled to only 320 acres of swamp lands, but bearing the assignment of the preference right filed by several men in 1870, he was entitled to 78,000 acres, because at the time of the first filing there was no limit to the amount of land that might be secured.

It must be remembered that at the time of the issuance of the certificates of sale to H. C. Owen and R. F. and Martin McConnaughy and for some time afterwards none of the lands so sold had been selected or approved as swamp or overflowed lands, belonging to the state of Oregon, by any officer, agent or representative of the state or of the United States.

On April 3, 1884, Owen sold his right in a portion of these lands to R. F. McConnaughy and other portions to other parties. April 8, 1884, he conveyed the title to all the rest of the lands then in his possession, 43,207 acres, to C. N. Felton, ex-United States senator from California, in consideration of $15,780.32 advanced by Felton in making payment of the twenty per cent. of the purchase price for the whole 78,901 acres, the certificate of sale of which was granted to Owen.

On October 15, 1884, Mr. Felton sold his interests to R. F. McConnaughy, who remained the owner of these lands until Jan. 15, 1892, when the Warner Valley Stock Company was formed and acquired title to all the lands in Warner valley which had been obtained from the state. It is this company which has been one of the parties to the litigation that has been in progress ever since.

During the eighties these lands were quite extensively settled upon by men who expected to secure title from the United States government under the laws provided for the disposition of agricultural lands. These settlers and the dates of their arrival upon the lands were as follows: J. L. Morrow, November 20, 1885; S. E. Sloan, November 17, 1885; D. T. Faskett, June, 1886; R. Beatty, November 17, 1885; W. M. Harvey, January 28, 1887; Charles Tonningsen, July, 1886; John H. Green, July, 1888; Peter Tonningesen, July, 1879; Emma Nesham, November 20, 1885; L. D. Frakes, September, 1887; Jesse B. Morrow, November 20, 1885; John W. Morrow, May 20, 1885; Joseph A. Morrow, November 20, 1885; A. D. Frakes, September 15, 1887; A. N. Bennett, May 28, 1885; T. B. Wakefield, November, 1885; L. N. Frakes, October 1, 1887; S. Dixen, January 16, 1886; L. F. Winkleman, November, 1885; Jerry Harrington, March 15, 1888; R. C. Clark, December 5, 1888; J. E. Dunnavan, January 16, 1888; A. D. Crawford, November 12, 1889; N. M. Frakes, August 12, 1887; John W. Morrow, March 12, 1888; W. H. Cooper, 1889; M. W. Poindexter, October 10, 1886.

These settlers were living upon the lands and cultivating them—lands which by previous surveys had been declared as being within the meandered lines of a lake. During the year 1886, and for some time prior disputes arose as to the ownership of the lands. Complaints were sent in to the general land office at Washington by settlers living on the lands and within the boundaries of what was returned as Lake Warner by the respective surveys of Evans in 1875 and of Byars and Gray in 1879. These settlers represented that there were large areas of dry land within the limits of the meandered lake, upon which land they had made bona fide settlements, and relief was earnestly requested.

as well as other lands in Eastern Oregon, had been the subject of conflicting reports by agents of the land department, and it was charged by those claiming under the settlement laws, that fraudulent returns had been made by deputy surveyors and other government officials, whereby lands dry and in many instances desert in character, had been described as swamp and overflowed, etc., in order that said lands might be certified to the state of Oregon under the provisions of the Act of March 12, 1860.

The charges of fraud against certain officials of the government, and those claiming as grantees of the state of Oregon, being pressed so vigorously and the demands of the settlers being repeated with such persistence, special agent, Charles Shackelford, was directed to investigate the alleged irregularities and frauds, and by letter of June 20, 1886, he submitted an exhaustive report, which in the main related to conditions existing in Warner valley.

His report was of no uncertain tone. He charged fraud right and left on the part of those who claimed the land as swamp and many of the government officials and surveyors. Extracts from his report follow. The names of those against whom he made charges are omitted and blanks substituted:

The survey of what is called Lake Warner, near Deep Creek, in T. 39 S. R. 24 E. W. M., was made in 1875 by the late register of the Lakeview land office, ....., who reported a false meander of that part of the so-called lake, and embraced within the meander lines over one thousand acres of good arable land, much of it requiring irrigation, upon which a number of settlers have constructed their cabins and are living in the lake in dry land. The meander corners and meander lines show unmistakable evidence of fraud. I found a like condition of affairs near Dug Out ranch, at the southern end of the so-called lake, where nearly two thousand acres of land, now occupied by settlers, have been fraudulently included within the meanders of the alleged lake by surveyors ....., in a survey made in 1879. I found the homes of fifteen or twenty settlers on land reported by surveyors ..... as within and part of Lake Warner in townships 39 and 40 S., R. 24 E. W. M.

My examination thus far justifies the conclusion that the reports of Messrs. .... and ..... in regard to swamp and overflowed lands are unreliable, inaccurate and corrupt, and that special agent, ..... 's report and acts are part and parcel of the conspiracy entered into by ..... and his confederates to defraud the United States out of large tracts of land, and that the attempted bribery of surveyor general, ....., the false surveys of the public domain; the perjury committed in proving up swampy and overflowed condition of mountains and elevated sagebrush plains; the procurement of the issuance of false certificates of sale by the state officers in Oregon; the bribery of special agent, .....; the procurement of the issuance of certificates of the Interior department authorizing the issue of patents on the faith of the corrupt reports of said ..... by the State of Oregon without any consideration; the sale by the said ..... to his secret partner, ....., of all his fraudulent titles to alleged swamp land and the sales by the said ..... of the titles to said land * * * all constitute links in the chain of a conspiracy to defraud the United States of the said lands.

The department of the Interior at once ordered a survey of all the lands embraced within the alleged Warner lake, or so much as practicable. Acting Secretary Muldrow said of the case at this time: "In fact, his report clearly indicates that there is no lake to be found as located by the government surveys. * * * The settlers can not, for the want of survey, get their claims of record, and it is stated that the swamp land claimants threaten them with suits in ejectment as trespassers."

The survey thus ordered was made in August and September, 1887, by John H. Neal and the survey was accepted by the department June 1, 1888. With the exception of a small meandered lake (Pelican), the area of which was given as 444.31 acres, the lines of survey were extended in their entirety through what had been returned as the bed of Lake Warner in T. 39 S. R. 24 E., 39 S. R. 25 E. and 40 S. R. 24 E., though the field notes showed much open water in places. The lands in the townships in question returned by Mr. Neal, which were shown by the former surveys to be in the lake, amounted to 9,913.36 acres in T. 39 S. R. 24 E.; 9,279.29 acres in T. 40 S. R. 24 E. and 2,801.20 acres in T. 39 S. R. 25 E.

Substantially all the land thus surveyed was claimed by the state and its grantees under the swamp land act of 1860 and was included in list 61 and presented to the Interior department in December, 1888. Many of the tracts were claimed by individuals under the United States laws for the disposal of agricultural lands, and controversies at once arose in the courts and land department. Some of the early contests were suits of replevin brought by R. F. McConnaughy, who claimed title under deed from the state, against J. N. Willey and many others to recover hay alleged to have been wrongfully cut by Willey and the other settlers from the land of McConnaughy. The defendants set up their defense by alleging that they had settled upon the lands, established residence, made improvements and maintained possession thereof, intending to acquire title under the provision of the preemption laws, and that the land at the date of settlement was vacant, unsurveyed public land of the United States.

The Washington authorities interested themselves in these suits and through the recommendation of Commissioner Sparks, the United States district attorney for Oregon, Lewis L. McArthur, was present at the trials to look after the interests of the government, and, in the language of the commissioner, "To spare no effort to prevent the acquisition of the lands in question under fraudulent claim." The cases came to trial and on January 16, 1888, Judge Deady decided in favor of the settlers. The court held that the purchaser from the state took the lands subject to the determination of the secretary of the Interior as to the character of the lands—whether or not they were swamp or overflowed, and that it did not appear that such question had ever been passed upon by the department of the Interior. Judge Deady in his decision said:

Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, it is not necessary to pass on the question whether this land is swamp or not. And I do not regret it. For in my judgment no one is qualified to decide the question in a case like this, where, apparently, there is room, in the present condition of the land, for difference of opinion, without having a view of the premises.

None of these cases was appealed from the decision of Judge Deady, nor were the cases further prosecuted in the federal courts.

But from the time of the approval and filing of the plats of the Neal survey in 1888, there arose numerous contests in the local courts of Oregon, as well as in the general land office. Injunctions and other writs were issued at the instance of those claiming as grantees of the state of Oregon, against those claiming under the timber culture, desert land, preemption and homestead laws, and the fifty or more claimants living in Warner valley at the time under the settlement laws nearly all had individual contests before the land department. Thousands of pages of testimony were taken in these cases. Some of the cases had been decided adversely to the settlers and many were still pending when, in 1892, the Interior department took action to settle all the cases.

On March 21, 1892, and on November 16, 1892, clear lists thirty and thirty-one, of Oregon swamp land selections, embracing nearly all the lands before and then involved in litigation, were submitted to the Interior department with the recommendation of the general land office that they be approved. April 9 and December 3, respectively, these lists were approved by Secretary Noble as inuring to the state of Oregon under the acts of congress September 28, 1850, and March 12, 1860. The approval of these lists was made "subject to any valid adverse rights that may exist to any of the tracts therein described," which was the uniform character of approval given to all swamp land lists.

The settler claimants, by resident counsel, on December 28, 1892, applied to the department for the exercise of its discretionary power over the lands embraced in said clear lists Nos. 30 and 31. Secretary Noble then directed that further investigation be made and that no patents be issued for the lands without further instructions. The assignee of the state at once filed applications for their patents and the settlers filed supplement statements, accompanied by numerous exhibits.

The secretary, after having considered the showing made in behalf of the two parties and after having examined all the records relating to the case, on March 3, 1893, revoked his previous order approving lists 30 and 31. He stated at the time that had the charges and allegations made by the settler claimants been before him prior to his approval of the lists, he would hardly have approved the same, without further examination, etc., and that he took this later action in order that the consideration of the cases might not be prejudiced by his action approving the lists in the absence of full and accurate information.

Hoke Smith became secretary of the Interior in March, 1893, and at once began an investigation of the Warner valley cases. In addition to the papers, files, reports and petitions which had been before the land office for years, he also had affidavits, statements and briefs filed by the respective parties subsequent to March 2, 1893. On December 19, 1893, he rendered a decision to the effect that on March 12, 1860, the lands involved were a part of the bed of Lake Warner, a permanent body of water, and that they were therefore not of the class and character contemplated by the act granting swamp lands to the state of Oregon. He took official notice of the fact that a great many contests arising between the claimants under the land laws of the United States and the state of Oregon and its grantees had been decided adversely to the settlers by the general land office, and that other contests of like character were then pending, and directed that the general land office "cause all decisions recommending or holding for cancellation entries or declaratory statements, upon the ground that the lands in contest were granted to the state of Oregon as swamp and overflowed lands by the act of March 12, 1860, to be set aside and annulled and the cases reinstated, and all contests based upon said ground alone, to be dismissed, and that you require all bona fide claims to said lands, lawfully initiated, to be prosecuted and perfected with all due diligence, according to law and the rules of practice."

An application for a new hearing was made to Secretary Smith, but on October 10, 1894, this was denied.

On December 13, 1894, there was transmitted to the Interior department clear list 39, made up of the tracts in lists 30 and 31 not within the area surveyed in 1887. There was presented to the department an application for certiorari by R. F. McConnaughy seeking to have reviewed the actions of the general land office of January 5, 1895, and the appeals of Jesse Morrow, Alexander Cameron, Robert Beaty, S. E. Sloan, Chas. Tonningson, Nils P. Tonningsen and Walter Poin-dexter from the action of the general land office of October 4, 1895, dismissing their protests against their approval of list No. 39. On August 4, 1896, Secretary Smith rejected and cancelled clear list No. 39, and in the decision of that date he said: "The true effect and meaning of the decision of December 19, 1893, in the case of Morrow et al vs. State of Oregon et al, above, was to cancel lists 30 and 31, and to reject and annul all claims of the state of Oregon and its alleged assignees to any and all of the tracts of land therein described. * * * The lands embraced in said lists 30, 31 and 39 were not on March 12, 1860, swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation, and the state of Oregon has no right, title or estate therein."

Apparently not satisfied that exact justice had been done, on August 11, 1896, Secretary Smith recalled his decision of the week before for further consideration and directed that all action thereunder be suspended until further notice. No definite further action was taken by the department of the Interior on these Warner valley cases until the spring of 1899, when the cases were again brought up and for several years were threshed out in all the departments.

Although the contestants did not find themselves fighting the cases over again in the land office prior to 1899, they were not idle and the courts had their innings, the case finally landing in the United States supreme court.

Prior to the decision by the department of August 4, 1896, the Warner Valley Stock Company filed a bill in equity in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against Secretary Smith and Commissioner Lamoreaux, claiming as grantee of the state under the acts of congress of 1850 and 1860.

It was prayed that Secretary Smith and the commissioner be directed to prepare and issue patents to the state of Oregon for the lands embraced in lists 30 and 31, it being contended that

Secretary Noble's approval of those lists was a final determination of the character of the lands embraced therein, and that thereafter he was without authority to recall or annul such approval, and that his action in revoking and cancelling the same was consequently void. The bill was dismissed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia on March 21, 1896, and upon the plaintiff's appeal the decree of that court was, on June 11, 1896, affirmed by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. In both the supreme court of the District of Columbia and in the court of appeals, the contention that the action of Secretary Noble approving said lists was final and not subject to reconsideration, was denied, and upon the further appeal of the Warner Valley Stock Company to the supreme court of the United States it was held that the suit was abated by the resignation of Secretary Smith, and it was directed that the bill be dismissed.

Secretary Francis, who succeeded Hoke Smith as the head of the Interior department, on Jan. 11, 1897, directed that all further action affecting the lists be suspended. His successor was to take office in a short time and he did not desire to take definite action which might not be in accord with his successor's plans.

The governor of Oregon, on April 5, 1897, addressed a communication to the department asking that patents issue for lands embraced in lists 30 and 31, but, in accordance with the decision of the department, no action was taken.

In the spring of 1899 preparations were made to start the cases all over again. E. A. Hitchcock, who had then become secretary of the Interior, noted the fact that each of his successors who had undertaken to dispose of the case had afterwards revoked or vacated his own decision and suspended action, that Secretary Francis, while rendering no decision in the case, had also suspended further action thereon; that therefore it was necessary that affirmative action be taken, and that as it did not appear that there had been a complete and fair hearing, with notice to all parties, he ordered that the decisions of December 19, 1893, October 10, 1894, and August 4, 1896, be accordingly vacated and all decisions respecting the character of these lands that had previously been rendered by the Interior department, the general land office or the Lakeview land office, be set aside with a view to a full and fair hearing after due notice to all concerned. It was further directed that the hearing should extend in addition to the lands embraced in lists 30, 31 and 39, to include any and all lands in controversy in Warner valley.

The north half of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 10, T. 33 S. R. 26 E., were included in approved list No. 31, but were omitted from the stipulation. It was also found that the southeast quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 3, T. 40 S. R. 24 E., included in the stipulation, were patented to the state as swamp land on March 25, 1890. September 16, 1899, the Warner Valley Stock Company filed a waiver or disclaimer of any intent or purpose to prove the swampy character of lot 12 in section 19 of T. 40 S. R. 24 E., embraced in the homestead entry of T. B. Wakefield.

It was agreed between the parties to the suit that the cases should be consolidated and tried as one case in so far as possible, and on July 17, 1899, the celebrated case of J. L. Morrow et al vs. The Warner Valley Stock Company was begun in the land office at Lakeview, before E. M. Brattai, register, and Harry Bailey, receiver. The attorneys for the settlers were John Mullan and Joseph K. McCammon, and for the state and the Warner Valley Stock Company were Frederick D. McKenny, Archibald Young and Chas. A. Cogswell. A continuance was had until July 31, and again until August 4, and it was August 7 before the trial began. The case was closed as to taking evidence on August 28.

Voluminous evidence as taken and the case as stubbornly contested by both sides. The settlers sought to prove that at the time of the grant of the swamp lands to the state, March 12, 1860, the lands which they were seeking to hold were the bed of a permanent lake and consequently not swamp lands. The state and its grantees sought to prove that at that time the land in question was a swamp. As there were no witnesses who had been in Warner valley in 1860, and none in subsequent years until 1864, the testimony was not of a direct nature.

On February 3, 1900, the local land officials rendered their decision favorable to the settlers. They held that from the testimony adduced it was reasonable to believe that the lands in question were on March 12, 1860, the bed of an apparently permanent lake, and as such did not come under the description of the lands granted to the state by the act of congress of 1860. The lands were therefore held to be open to settlement under the homestead, preemption and other laws applicable to settlers. A paragraph from the decision reads:

"The testimony shows that in 1864 the lands in controversy were covered with an apparently permanent body of water, and the weight of testimony tends to show that this body of water continued to cover this land until about the year 1881; that the waters had gradually receded with the exceptions of a few years at intervals, when they would rise again, until the year 1881, after which they continued to gradually recede until the fall of 1889, when the land in contest became practically dry."

The decision was a complete victory for the settlers. However, it was understood by both parties that the case would be carried to the highest authorities. The valuable lands of Warner valley, which had been the cause of strife for so many years, were not to be lost by either side by an adverse decision in the local land office. On February 28 and March 9, 1900, respectively, the state of Oregon and the Warner Valley Stock Company filed appeal and specifications of error on appeal. This brought the case up before the general land office, of which Binger Hermann was commissioner. Briefs were submitted by both parties and oral arguments were heard by the commissioners, the hearing beginning on Jan. 18, 1900.

November 6 Commissioner Hermann reversed the decision of the local land office, ruling in favor of the state and stock company. Then, following the precedent of all who had previously handled the cases, the commissioner, on November 30, vacated his decision for further consideration because of "my attention having been called to the omission of very material testimony necessary for a just and impartial review of the merits of the case," and for other causes. Mr. Hermann then gave the matter his personal attention and reviewed the case in all its details. He said in his later decision:

Impressed with the gravity of the question at issue, as there is involved herein the title to thousands of acres of fertile and valuable land, conscious of the many suits at law and equity and contests before the land department, the continuous litigation of many years that has destroyed the peace of all parties hereto and wasted their substance in fees, costs and retainers, and doubting whether a just and right conclusion had been reached, I decided that, notwithstanding the great labor involved in the examination of so voluminous a record, the limited time now at my disposal, as in addition to the routine duties of this office, I am, during the sessions of the congress, called upon to consider bills and proposed legislation affecting the disposition of the public domain, it was my duty to personally consider said case. I have, therefore, in pursuance of such determination, attempted by personal examination of the papers in the case and the files, plats and field notes of survey on record in this office relating thereto, to reach the very truth as to whether said lands were "swamp and overflowed" within the meaning of the act of Sept. 28, 1850, at the time the provisions of said act were extended conditionally to the state of Oregon, to-wit, March 12, 1860. The task was not an easy one. It has, however, convinced me that the former conclusion was not justified by what I now find from a personal search and reading of the testimony to be the real facts in the case and herein will be found not as before, a few incomplete references, but a full and careful summary and review of all the material facts.

In an exhaustive review of the case and decision rendered March 2, 1901, Commissioner Hermann permanently recalled his decision of November 6, 1900, and upheld the decision of the local land office. In this finding, addressed to the officers of the Lakeview land office, he said:

The communication of this office, dated Nov 6, 1900, reversing your office and awarding the land in controversy to the state of Oregon et al., temporarily recalled on Nov. 30, 1900, for further consideration, is now on motion of this office permanently recalled, vacated and annulled, in whole and in part, and the following findings and judgment substituted in lieu thereof:

The lands included in lists 30, 31, 39 and all others described by the agreement of stipulation filed in the office of the Honorable Secretary of the Interior on May 4, 1899, were not as a whole nor as to the greater portion of a smallest legal subdivision, swamp and overflowed on March 12, 1860, and that the state of Oregon and those claiming under it, has no title, interest or estate in and to any part of said lands by or through the provisions of the act of March 12, 1860. It is therefor the judgment of this office that the claim of the state of Oregon and those holding under it, in and to any of the lands included in lists 30, 31 and 39, or described in the foregoing stipulation, in any way arising or asserted by or through the provisions of the act of Sept. 28, 1850, as extended to the state of Oregon by the act of March 12, 1860, should be held as naught, rejected and cancelled, and said claims are hereby rejected and said lists held for cancellation.

The case having once been considered by the department is current work and in case appeal is filed, the case will be so treated and forwarded to the department as such.

Notify the parties thereof. Resident counsel will be advised by this office.

Respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN,
Commissioner.

This was the second consecutive victory for the settlers, and their hopes for a final settlement in their favor were high. Of course, it was understood that the case would be appealed to the secretary of the Interior, but having favorable decisions from both the local land office and the general land office, they were led to believe that their contentions would be sustained by the higher authority. An appeal was at once taken by the state of Oregon and the Warner Valley Stock Company to the secretary of the Interior, where the case was again reviewed in all its details.

Secretary Hitchcock rendered a decision on March 16, 1903, in which he reversed Commissioner Hermann and found the facts to be diametrically opposite to those found by the commissioner. Mr. Hermann had held that the lands in question were on March 12, 1860, the bed of an apparently permanent lake, and as such did not come under the provisions of the act granting swamp lands to the state of Oregon. Here is Mr. Hitchcock's finding in this regard:

The evidence established that the lands in controversy at the date of the grant were not the bed of a lake or apparently permanent body of water, but were swamp lands, subject at times to be entirely overflowed, and at all seasons were thereby rendered unfit for cultivation. While these lands would for considerable periods of any year of ordinary rain or snow-fall present the appearance of a shallow lake, a careful examination would then, or at any time, have disclosed from its vegetation and soil, that it was a swamp upon which the waters coming in time of floods were retained by the spongy soil, dense and fallen vegetation, and lack of drainage channels, and that it was not a lake or permanent body of water retained by continuing banks or shores.

Concluding his decision the secretary, in a letter to Commissioner Hermann, said.

For the reasons herein given, your office decision of March 2, 1901, rejecting the claim of the state is reversed, and all of the claims, except that of the heirs of Amos Boyd, and any other existing preemption claim which has been or may be perfected before this decision is carried into effect, are hereby rejected.

Your office will prepare and submit for approval a new swamp land list, embracing such of the lands in controversy as properly pass to the state under this decision.

Very Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

This was a blow to the settlers who for so many years had fought for the possession of the lands upon which they had made their homes. They at once asked for a review of the case, but their request was denied, Secretary Hitchcock declaring the case to be closed so far as the Interior department was concerned.

Finding that no further hearing could be had before United States officials, the settlers took their case to the state authorities. In June, 1903, thirty-two settlers presented a petition to the state land board, asking that the state should not take patent to the lands, as it had a right to do under a recent decision of the department of the Interior. The settlers asked that the state give up its claim, so that the United States government might be free to issue patents to the lands to the settlers.

The settlers interested Gov. Geo. E. Chamberlain in their behalf, and that official became very active in his efforts to protect the interests of the Warney valley citizens. He requested the Washington authorities to withhold the issuance of the patents in favor of the state until he had thoroughly investigated the case, but his request was ignored by the Interior department. In October, 1903, he started for Washington on business connected with the case and before departing left instructions that when the United States patent conveying title to the swamp lands to the state arrived in should no be filed or recorded. The state had already conveyed its title to the stock company and all that was lacking for the stock company to get clear title was the filing of the patent conveying title to the state.

Ordinarily a patent or deed is delivered by the grantor to the grantee. In this case, however, the attorneys for the Warner Valley Stock Company evidently expected delay if the patent reached the governor's hands, and they secured the document direct from the general land office at Washington. News to this effect was received by the state authorities at Salem on October 13, 1903. This proceeding was in accordance with instructions from Secretary Hitchcock.

Balked in their attempts to prevent the issuance of the patent, the settlers, now vigorously backed by Governor Chamberlain, sought relief in the state courts. In April, 1904, the settlers asked the state land board to begin a suit against the Warner Valley Stock Company to set aside the deeds by which the company and its predecessors secured the land from the state. The settlers offered to pay all the costs of the suit and secure the state against loss. The board was of contrary opinion as to whether or not to proceed as requested. Secretary of State Dunbar and State Treasurer Moore, constituting a majority of the board, decided on May 5, that the board had no authority to order a suit brought. Gov. Chamberlain, the other member of the board, filed a protest and then sent to Attorney General Crawford a letter directing him to bring suit in the name of the state to set aside the deeds. In this letter the governor was very positive in his statement of belief and very caustic in his remarks concerning the case and those government officials who had conducted it. The letter in part is as follows:

Hon. A. M. Crawford,
Attorney General,
Salem, Oregon.

May 5, 1904.

Dear Sir—J. L. Morrow and other settlers in what is known as Warner valley, in township 39 south, range 24 east, have, through their attorney, Hon. John H. Hall, made application to the state land board, requesting the members thereof to authorize a suit to be instituted in the name of the state of Oregon against the Warner Valley Livestock Company to have cancelled and set aside certain deeds made by the state land board in 1891 and in 1899 to said Warner Valley Stock Company, or its predecessors in interest, but a majority of the state land board have declined to comply with the request of the settlers for the reasons set forth in the records of the state land board, to which I now refer you. As a minority member of the state land board I disagreed with the board and felt then and feel now that the state land board should have granted the application of the settlers and should have requested you as Attorney General of the state to institute proceedings to cancel and annul the deeds referred to.

In about 1885 J. L. Morrow and other persons undertook to and did settle on about 5,000 acres of land embraced within the Owen's application; improved cultivated and built homes on the same and are now in actual possession thereof. It does not appear that any of the settlers ever had a hearing before the state land board. For nearly twenty years they have contested the claim of the Warner Valley Livestock Company and its predecessors in interest in the federal land office with varying degrees of success. Sometimes decisions have been rendered in their favor and sometimes against them.

My attention was called to this contest by these settlers nearly a year ago, and I have given their claims and the claims of the Warner Valley Livestock Company my very careful and painstaking consideration, and so much impressed was I with the belief that these settlers had not had such a hearing as I felt they were entitled to as citizens of this state that when I was notified by the commissioner of the general land office at Washington that the lands in controversy had been clear listed to the state as swamp land, I requested that no patent should be issued until I had investigated the merits of the controversy between the conflicting claimants. The swamp land act provides in substance that the patent to swamp lands shall issue at the request of the governor. Notwithstanding the fact that I did not request the issuance of the patent but on the contrary vigorously protested to the secretary of the Interior against the issuance hereof until the matter could be investigated by me, the patent did issue and contrary to all precedent was not delivered to the officers of the state and never has been, nor has it ever been recorded. On the contrary, I was advised by the department that the patent had been placed in the hands of the Warner Valley Livestock Company.

Under all these circumstances I feel that the settlers on the land in controversy have had a right to have their cause heard, tried and determined in our own courts, untrammelled by any of the "red tape" methods of the department of the Interior, over the doors of which the plain, every day, ordinary citizen of the United States, at least finds written the motto which is found inscribed over Dante's Inferno: "Who enters here leaves hope behind."

If these men are defeated in one of the courts of our state the controversy will be ended; otherwise, in my opinion, there will always lurk in the minds of many of the citizens of this state the suspicion that they have not obtained a fair and impartial hearing of their cause.

I, therefore, as governor and ex-officio land commissioner of the state of Oregon request you as attorney general of the state to institute a suit in the name of the state against the present owners of the land in controversy, with the end in view of ascertaining whether or not they have been fraudulently obtained from the state. Provided, however, the parties directly in interest give satisfactory security to indemnify the state against the cost and expenses that may be incurred by such suit as provided by section 370 of Bellinger & Cotton's Code.

I have the honor to remain,

Yours very truly,

GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,

Governor.

Attorney General Crawford brought the suit as directed, and thus we find, in 1904, the state of Oregon on the side of the settlers, where always before the state had had its name linked with that of the Warner Valley Stock Company in all suits.

The suit was brought in the circuit court of Lake county before Judge H. L. Benson. John Hall, former United States district attorney, and E. B. Watson, former judge of the state supreme court, appeared as assistant counsel for the state in the suit. The bill set up alleged frauds and prayed for the cancellation of the patents and a decree that the patents were void.

The Warner Valley Stock Company filed a demurrer on the ground that the facts alleged did not constitute a cause of suit. The case was argued before Judge Benson and submitted shortly before the vacation in 1904. Judge Benson had the case under advisement until January 13, 1905, when he signed an order sustaining the demurrer and forwarded the order to Lake county to be entered in the records of the circuit court.

In sustaining the demurrer, Judge Benson held in substance that the state did not have an interest sufficient to permit it to be a plaintiff in the proceedings. The United States supreme court has held that the government cannot properly be a party plaintiff unless it has either a pecuniary interest in the result of the litigation or is under some obligation to some person or persons, which obligation is necessarily involved in the result of the litigation. Following this principle Judge Benson held that the state, having received full value for the lands in controversy, as swamp lands, and being under no obligation to the homesteaders or other claimants under the federal laws, had no substantial interest in the result of the litigation, and therefore could not maintain the suit.

This is the last decision on the case and in this manner the matter stands at present. An appeal has been taken to the supreme court, but a hearing has not yet been had. Some time it will be decided once and forever in favor of one party or the other.

Many of the settlers, worn out by the prolonged litigation, abandoned their homes, making the best terms possible with the stock company. The others, about thirty in number, have, since their settlement in the valley, lived upon and occupied the lands in controversy. The lands are very productive and were it not for the heavy expense of litigation, the valley would be one of the most wealthy in the state of Oregon.

THE WAGON ROAD LANDS.

Not resulting in the extended litigation that characterized the procurement of the Warner valley lands, but of great importance to Lake county was the grant of a large tract of land within its borders to the state of Oregon, which was later turned over to a private corporation, for alleged services rendered.

Like all other undeveloped countries, southeastern Oregon in the early days needed aid in its development; some action or inducement from the government was deemed necessary to bring in settlement. The territory was rough and untraversed. Bands of Indians roamed the hills and valleys at will, and the county's isolated condition offered them an opportunity to hold their country for their own.

It was believed that the southeastern part of the state would be found to be a hidden treasure ground if it could only be reached by a sufficient number of thrifty settlers to make a stand among the savages. To accomplish this, it was believed that roads must be built from civilization into the country. It devolved upon the state to build these roads as there were no county governments with sufficient interest or means to accomplish the huge task. Even the state hesitated at the enormous expense, and appealed to the United States government for aid. Application was made for a grant from the government of every odd section by numbers, three miles on either side of the road proposed to be built.

The Oregon Central Military Wagon Road Company was organized and contracted with the state to construct a wagon road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary line of the state. This road was surveyed and enough work was done on it to secure the lands granted for the construction of the road. The road took a southeasterly course from Eugene City through Lane county and across the Cascade range, striking the present Klamath county near its northwest corner. It then followed a more southerly course to the southern boundary of the Klamath Indian reservation; thence an easterly course was taken to the western boundary of what is now Lake county. From its point of entrance to Lake county the road bore southeast, passing the site of the present town of Lakeview. From that point the road ran northeast to the only feasible crossing in Warner valley, the point where was afterwards built the stone bridge. This crossing was a about a quarter of a mile wide, while for twenty miles north and as far south the valley was impassible. This bridge is a natural division between North and South Warner. From here the road took a northeasterly and easterly course to the east boundary of the state.

The grant to aid in the building of this road was made by congress, approved July 2, 1864, the act being entitled "an act granting lands to the state of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said state." Amended acts were passed by congress, approved December 3, 1866, and March 3, 1869. By these acts all the vacant and unappropriated lands in the alternate sections, designated by odd numbers, three miles on either side of the proposed road was granted to the state of Oregon by the United States government, and the state in turn granted these lands to the Oregon Central Military Wagon Road Company. It was a vast undertaking and months were consumed in arranging the preliminaries. In fact more time was consumed in making sure of the grant than was spent in building the road.

Through the territory which is now Lake county the road was very poorly constructed, and considerable difficulty was encountered in tracing the road. A crossing was effected at the north end of Goose Lake by means of long ropes. When the swamp in Warner was reached tules were cut, bound in bundles and thrown into the swamp until the working crews could cross, but it is not known how the rim-rock on the east side of Warner valley was climbed. When, in 1867, the soldiers attempted to cross by this road in moving the post to the west side of the lake, they were unable to do so without spending a long time in making the rock fill, as told in the first chapter of the Lake county history.

Notwithstanding the loose methods employed in the construction of the road, on July 2, 1870, the governor of Oregon approved the road and the lands passed into the hands of the wagon road company. The company was now the owner of the alternate sections three miles on either side of the road. But the act provided that only the unappropriated and unreserved lands should pass to the state, and consequently as some of the lands in the odd numbered sections within the grant, especially on the west side of the mountains, were otherwise claimed, the company did not obtain title to as much land as it desired, and steps were at once taken to secure a further allotment.

An appeal was made to the United States government for an additional grant the entire length of the road, three miles on either side of the original grant, to be known as indemnity lands, and from which selections could be made in lieu of lands located previous to the company's grant. No trouble was experienced in securing this additional grant, it being approved December 8, 1871, by C. Delano, secretary of the Interior.

By the original grant and the additional indemnity strip the road company secured approximately 400,000 acres of land in Lake county. Litigation resulted between settlers on this land and the road company, but the company won in every instance and finally secured absolute title to all the lands it claimed. Several transfers had been made by the settler claimants, but the fact that innocent parties were in possession gave them no advantage.

In 1903 the California and Oregon Land and Livestock Company purchased all the road lands in Lake county, and in fact all east of the Cascade mountains. This company has sold some of the lands and leased other portions. Efforts have been repeatedly made to consolidate the lands by exchanging with the government, but a transfer has never been effected.

CHAPTER IV

CITIES AND TOWNS.

In Lake county are four towns. The largest and most important of these is Lakeview, the county seat and only incorporated town in the county—a place of about 1,000 population. The other three, in the order of their size, are Paisley, New Pine Creek and Silver Lake, all towns of from 150 to 300 population, each surrounded by a country almost an empire in size, from which to draw support.

Besides these towns are four postoffices as follows: Adel, Plush, Summer Lake and Warner Lake. The two first named each support a store; the other two are simply country post-offices, established and maintained for the convenience of the citizens residing in the vicinity.

LAKEVIEW.

Lakeview, the capital and principal town of Lake county, is a city of nearly 1,000 inhabitants. It is beautifully situated in Goose Lake valley, about four miles north of Goose lake. The town is builded up against a ridge of hills which extend north and south to the east of the town. On the other three sides extends Goose Lake valley, as level as a billiard table, for several miles. The elevation of this point is 4,825 feet above sea level, one of the highest towns of Oregon. Lakeview is a beautiful town, its business houses being almost entirely constructed of brick, and its residences of latest architectural design and all neatly painted. It is not only a pretty town, but it is also a splendid business point.

Lakeview is one of the remote towns of interior Oregon, and yet it is one of the most prosperous in the whole interior country. It enjoyed the distinction a few years ago of being the farthest from a railroad of any county seat town in the United States. During the greatest part of its history Lakeview was 150 miles from the nearest railroad point, but the construction of a narrow gauge road to Madeline, Cal., has reduced this distance to ninety-five miles. In all other directions the town is a much greater distance to a railroad. Although it is far from a railroad, it is connected by first-class stage lines with all the surrounding towns, all of which carry mail. To the west a line extends to Bly, connecting there with lines to Bonanza, Klamath Falls and Pokogama, on the Klamath Lake railroad. To the north a line runs to Paisley and Silver Lake, connecting with Prineville and all towns to the north. To the south a stage line operates to New Pine Creek, Alturas and Madeline, the nearest railroad point. All these stage lines are daily. To the east is a tri-weekly line to the Warner Valley country.

Lakeview, although an inland town, is not so remote from the outside world that it is void of the modern conveniences. An instance of the energetic nature of the people: Years ago some of the early settlers concluded that about the first thing necessary to the well being of a well regulated town was a city waterworks. Away in the mountains several hundred feet above the town-site, were a number of springs which they appropriated. Iron pipe to convey the water down the canyon was then an impossibility so far away from the railroad. They procured machinery and manufactured wooden pipe from pine logs. The wooden pipe served the purpose until 1904, when the increased population made it necessary to increase the capacity of the plant. Steel pipe was substituted for the wooden pipe that had done service for so many years, and today Lakeview has a modern waterworks system capable of supplying a city of 10,000 inhabitants, with the best of pure, spring water. Two of the advantages that Lakeview people mention, when speaking of their city, is their fine school and an abundance of good, pure water. A modern electric light plant, driven by water power, located at Pine Creek, fifteen miles away, supplies the city with electric light.

Lakeview is a self made town, made by self made men. There is not a dollar of outside capital invested in any enterprise in the town. The people have worked out their own salvation and they are proud of it. While many of the leading citizens are inclined to boast modestly of what they have accomplished as individuals and as a community, they have no desire to build a Chinese wall around their community for the exclusion of the outsider. The newcomer is always welcomed—outside capital is not regarded as dangerous to the well-being of the people. While, as has been noted, no outside capital has so far found its way to Lakeview, it is not to be inferred that there is no room for the outsider with money to invest in legitimate enterprises.

Lakeview is a centennial town. The founders of the city waited until the government of the United States was 100 years old before they put Lakeview on the map.

In a preceding chapter we have told of General Crook's subjugation of the Snake Indians, and of the comparative rapid settlement of Goose Lake valley, which, prior to 1869, was without settlers. It was only natural that in time a town should spring up in this valley, then the most thickly settled portion of the lake country.

Among those who came to the valley in 1869 was M. W. Bullard, a bachelor, who settled near the head of the valley, upon land that is described in official papers as section 15, township 39 south, range 20 east—the land upon which the town of Lakeview was afterwards built. Here Mr. Bullard took two claims of 160 acres each, one under the preemption law and the other under the homestead law. He obtained title to the preemption claim on January 20, 1871, and to the homestead claim June 24, 1878. Mr. Bullard lived on this land until after the town was started, but moved away soon after. The place was known among the early day settlers as "Bullard's Ranch" or "Bullard's Creek." Today the former owner's name is perpetuated in the creek that flows through the town, a canyon through which the creek flows and one of the principal streets of Lakeview.

Mr. Bullard built a log house near where Harry Bailey's residence now stands, on the preemption claim, and afterwards moved it onto his homestead, near the M. T. Walters residence. The structure was rudely put up of rough logs, and partitioned off into three apartments. One was used for a living room, where Mr. Bullard cooked his meals, ate and slept; the next room was used for a wood shed and store room, and the other was used for a barn. His land was enclosed by an oddly built fence. A trench or ditch, about two feet wide by two feet deep, was dug around the land, and posts were set at intervals along this ditch, upon which poles were placed, fastened with wire.

The site upon which was afterwards built the town of Lakeview was well known to all the early settlers of the Lake country. C. U. Snider has told the writer of a trip he made from Camp Warner to Willow Ranch in 1869, passing along the north end of Goose lake. The site of the future Lakeview was then covered with a very tall growth of grass and was, indeed, a beautiful spot. The day he first saw the location a large band of antelope was browsing there. M. T. Walters, who came to Goose Lake valley in 1872, has written of this spot as follows:

I saw the spot on which Lakeview now stands when the calmness of undisturbed nature was upon it. In the spring of 1872, approaching this place from the west, I was obliged to pass around the north end of the valley to get to the east side. The gently inclined plain upon which our pretty little town is built was then a beautiful meadow, all covered with water. The lake then extended north to this point. A mean log cabin, belonging to a man named Bullard, was standing at the mouth of the canyon of that name, and was the only indication that a man had been here before me. The landscape was indeed beautiful. Wild birds and animals looked at me in shy surprise, but could hardly be said to be afraid of one.

For some time Mr. Bullard was without near neighbors, but later a family named Petree settled on the other part of section 15. The Petrees took a squatter's claim, but never proved up on it. In the family were four brothers, James, William F., Malen and Tom. They lived in a little log cabin located about where V. L. Snelling's residence now stands. When the town was founded in 1876 the Petree and Bullard cabins were the only ones on the townsite.

Prior to the year 1876 the thought of establishing a town at this spot never entered the mind of anyone. In order to make clear the reasons for the founding of a town in the valley at this time we shall review briefly a subject treated heretofore in this work.

By an act of the legislature of 1874, Lake county, then including the present counties of Lake and Klamath, was created, and Linkville (the present Klamath Falls) was named as the temporary county seat, the selection of a permanent seat of government being left to be decided at the general election in June, 1876. At that time the settlers of eastern Lake county outnumbered those of the western portion, but the west enders had the advantage in one particular—they had a town, Linkville, which had been founded in 1867 by George Nurse. It was this fact that led the legislature to name a place on the west side as the temporary county seat. Outnumbering the Klamath settlers, the settlers of Goose Lake valley and of the other settled portions of the east side laid their plans to secure the county seat at the June election in 1876. In order that the whole vote should be concentrated they agreed among themselves to vote for "Bullard's Creek" or Bullard's Ranch." Mr. Bullard agreed to deed twenty acres of his land to the county should his place be selected. A. and C. U. Snider, who had previously been post traders at Camp Warner, but more recently engaged in the mercantile business at Willow Ranch, Cal., were prevailed upon to open a store at Bullard's Ranch, and in April the store building was begun, the first business house of the coming Lakeview. The vote for the location of the county seat in June was clearly in favor of Bullard's Ranch, but this preference was made known on the ballots under such a variety of names that the removal of the county government was not accomplished until some months later. The question of the location was voted on again at the November election, and by this time "Bullard's Creek" had become "Lakeview," and was the choice by a vote of 242 over 181 for Linkville. Almost immediately thereafter the county records were moved to the new seat of government.

But during the summer and fall of this year, while the campaign for the permanent location of the county seat was going on, the town of Lakeview was coming into existence, and by the beginning of 1877 there was quite a little village here. To this place was given the name of Lakeview because of the excellent view of Goose lake that could be obtained from the townsite at that time. The lake then extended farther north than it does at the present time, and at the time of the founding "Lakeview" was not a misnomer.

The store building of A. and C. U. Snider, which had been begun in April, was completed in September, and a stock of general merchandise was put in. The store stood on the corner at present occupied by Bailey & Massingill's general merchandise store. Goods were freighted in from Red Bluff, Cal., by horse teams, over a rough and rocky winding road, a distance of 250 miles. It required about thirty days to make the trip for goods, and these trips were accomplished with more or less danger on account of the Indians. Andy McCallen was placed in charge of the store, and he also kept the postoffice, which was established that year. The first mail delivered at the office was carried from Fort Bidwell on horseback, but later a mail route was established from Redding, Cal. The arrival of the first mail was a great event. The papers, then a month old, seemed as fresh and newsy to the inhabitants of the little town and were read with even more eagerness than is now the case with the dailies, forty-eight hours from the press.

The second building erected was a hotel put up by A. R. Jones on the lot opposite where the Hotel Lakeview now stands. This hostelry, though unpretentious, was a creditable frontier establishment, and many a weary traveler found there the warmest hospitality and much needed refreshment from a hard journey through a country very thinly inhabited. John Moon began the construction of a livery stable the same year, but sold out to M. T. Walters, who completed the building and conducted the first feed and livery stable. Mart Hopkins built a blacksmith shop that year, located about where Mr. Lake's repair shop is now. He also erected a residence about where the George Jammerthal's business establishment now stands.

Another stroke of enterprise in 1876 was the erection of a two story building, to be used for a court house, by Geo. Conn on the present location of the Neilon residence. A saloon license was granted to T. J. Hickman by the county court on August 6, 1876, and his was the first saloon in Lakeview. It was located where the Hotel Lakeview now stands.

These were buildings erected and enterprises started in the town during 1876, and they presented quite a showing on the spot where a few months before there were only two log cabins. Of this period of the town's history Mr. Walters has said: "Most of our early day visitors were from the Rogue river or Willamette valleys. They were to us as our newspapers now are. If a newspaper chanced to come into possession of one of us it was passed around and read in every family, and reread until worn out from handling; it, though we were more careful with it than with money."

The town was not yet platted, but preparations were made for the platting in the following spring. On December 7, 1876, Mr. Bullard deeded the county twenty acres of land and on the following day sold the other 300 acres to J. A. Moon. The townsite was platted by Mr. Moon on May 25, 1877. The site was surveyed by Frank M. Cheesman, and consisted of blocks A, 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. On the west of the site ran the county road, and parallel to this, one block east, was Water street. The present Main street was not laid out. Running east and west, separating the blocks, were Bullard street and Canyon street. The plat was recorded in the records of Lake county on May 26.

Additions to the town of Lakeview have since been platted as follows:

North and South additions, July 14, 1878, by John A. Moon.

West addition, July 20, 1878, by John A. Moon, George Freeman, Alice E. Freeman, Thos..

Colbin, L. A. Colvin, Joseph Robnett and Mary E. Robnett.

County Property addition was filed on February 17, 1877, but was not recorded until April 3, 1886. This addition consisted of four blocks and was the property of Lake county.

Walters' addition, November 14, 1899, by M. T. Walters.

McCallen's addition, October 6, 1900, by A. McCallen.

Lane's addition, August 13, 1902, by F. P. Lane.

The year 1877 and the few following years were not much behind 1876 in the matter of construction of buildings and establishment of business houses. During the winter of 1876-7 A. Tenbrook moved a building from his ranch, about five miles down the valley, to the new town and started a second hotel, the Overland House. In the fall of 1877 C. A. Cogswell put up a two story building, and in the lower part of this Dr. Casen opened a drug store. Dr. Wright moved to the new town from Davis creek in 1877 and became the first doctor. He remained only a short time and moved away. Returning shortly, however, he purchased the Casen drug store. Cobb Henkle opened the second saloon in 1877. Odd Fellows hall was erected that year and the lower floor was occupied by a saloon.

Soon J. W. Howard moved his store building from Hagerhorst and J. Frankl put one up, both being built on the locations now occupied by buildings still belonging to the same men. E. W. Joseph built a residence back of the Frankl store, which was later purchased by M. T. Walters and moved to where Mr. Walters now resides. The State Line Herald was established by Watson Bros. in 1878. A man by the name of Goos built a two story brewery on the corner now occupied by Reynolds & Wingfield. Other early day business enterprises were a shoe shop opened by A. Buckhart and a barber shop by Cosley Snelling. Hagerdine & Latta built the town's first brick building, on the present site of Ahlstrom's harness store and there opened a general merchandise store.

By the close of the year 1878 we find in the little town three general merchandise stores, two hotels, a newspaper, two livery stables, a harness shop, two blacksmith shops, a barber shop, two saloons, a drug store, and a county seat.

An important event in the history of the town was the removal of the land office from Linkville where it had been established several years before, to Lakeview in the spring of 1879. James Evans and George Conn were the first register and receiver, respectively, upon its removal. Geo. Conn was succeeded as receiver by Jerome Knox, who served with Mr. Evans and also with Warren Truett, who succeeded Mr. Evans as register. Truett and Knox were succeeded by A. F. Snelling, register, and Wm. H. Townsend, receiver. Warren Truett again became the register of the Lakeview land office in 1889 and served until 1892. C. U. Snider became receiver in 1890 and served until 1894. J. W. Watts succeeded Mr. Truett in 1892 and served two years. W. A. Wilshire was appointed register and V. L. Snelling receiver by President Cleveland in 1894 and served four years. They were succeeded in 1898 by E. M. Brattain, register, and Harry Bailey, receiver, who served until 1903. The present incumbents were then installed. They are J. N. Watson, register, and C. U. Snider, receiver.

The year 1880 marked the first fire that visited Lakeview. The large two story brewery building of Mr. Goos was destroyed, together with the plant of the pioneer newspaper, the State Line Herald. The next fire of any importance was the A. R. Jones hotel building. Aside from these all the early day buildings remained intact until the big fire of May 22, 1900.

By 1880 Lakeview had grown to be a town of 270 people, according to the federal census taken that year. During the eighties Lakeview emerged from its pioneer ways. There was no boom, no rush, but a steady advancement. Settlers were coming into the country and the town advanced to keep pace with the settlement. Each year witnessed the beginning of a few new enterprises. The year 1887 was an exceptionally prosperous one for the little town. That year $60,000 was spent in building improvements.

By 1889 the citizens believed the town had reached a stage where incorporation was needed. The act incorporating Lakeview became a law February 20, 1889, when it was filed in the office of the secretary of state. The act provided for the government of the town by a mayor and common council of four members, and that the other officers should be a recorder, attorney, marshal, treasurer and surveyor, all to be elected at annual elections. The first election was held on March 11, 1889, and thereafter the annual elections have been held on the first Monday of each November. The judges of the first election were Joseph Lane, W. H. Lackey and P. G. Christman, and the clerks were W. R. Stark and F. W. Beach. Those who were elected and thus had the honor of first serving the city in an official capacity were: W. M. Townsend, mayor; Will T. Boyd, B. Daly, J. S. Field, John McElhurney, councilmen; Jerome Knox, attorney; Al Heminger, marshal; S. C. Wallis, treasurer; J. Q. Willits, recorder. The first meeting of the council was held on March 18, 1889.

South Lakeview, a few miles south of the county seat town, was platted May 12, 1891, by Geo. G. Gibson, whose purpose seems to have been to found a rival to Lakeview. A neighboring newspaper said of the attempt:

A Yankee has reached Lake county with a yearning to be the founder of a new city. His name is Geo. G. Gibson, of Oswego, N. Y., and he proposes to start a 40 acre town three miles south of Lakeview. Laid off in town lots, streets, alleys and lanes, there lies the tract, away up on the mountain opposite Frank Duke's place, and it looks at a distance like seven or eight rows of old barn yards somebody had dragged up there to give them fresh air. We fear it will be a long time before the boom strikes South Lakeview.

And it has not struck yet. Although the town-site of South Lakeview never reached the importance of having a building erected upon it, it was extensively advertised and nearly all the lots were sold in the east by the gifted Gibson.

February 10, 1893, a revised charter was granted Lakeview by the legislature. The new charter provided for the government of the town by a mayor and four councilmen as did the former charter. The recorder and treasurer under the new charter were to be elected, but the marshal, street commissioner and town attorney were to be appointed by the council. The new charter was broader than the old one and provided for several improvements which the old one did not.

During the middle nineties there was no material advancement in Lakeview, owing to the prevailing hard times. However, it was not hit so hard as were many of the towns of the country which relied for their support on an agricultural country. Emerging from the depression in the late nineties, the town took on new life.

In 1898 a new charter was granted to the town of Lakeview, giving power to undertake some needed municipal improvements. During this period the town, which had been before the most completely isolated, was given telephonic and telegraphic connections with the outside world.

In 1899 agitation was begun for the construction of a system of waterworks and an electric lighting system. A proposition to bond the city for $25,000 for these purposes was voted down that year, but on March 27, 1900, by a vote of 44 to 20, authorization was given for the issuance of $10,000 bonds for these purposes, and shortly after both were put in by the municipality.

May 22, 1900, is a date that will never be forgotten by anyone who was in Lakeview on the evening of that day. It was the day of the big fire, one of the most destructive that ever visited a town of the size of Lakeview. Every business house in the town, except two, was consumed, and a loss of about $250,000 was entailed. Sixty-four buildings were destroyed, many of them big merchandise stores carrying immense stocks.

In this great conflagration there were destroyed six general merchandise stores, one dry goods store, two drug stores, two hardware stores, two harness and saddlery stores, two jewelry stores, three confectionery stores, one furniture and undertaking store, one fruit and vegetable store, three hotels, one restaurant, one grill room, one brewery, six saloons, three barber shops, one blacksmith shop, one wagon maker's shop, two printing offices, two dental offices, two bicycle shops, one law office, one soda fountain, one shoe shop, postoffice building, government land office, Bank of Lakeview, telegraph office, one livery stable, one laundry, three millinery stores, one tailor shop, eight residences, town hall and jail, Masonic and Odd Fellows halls, two physicians' offices, one paint shop and one butcher shop. The extent of the fire can be summed up as follows: Two entire blocks in the main business portion of the town were completely wiped out. The greater portion of six other blocks adjoining the two mentioned were consumed, taking in the entire business portion, including several residences.

The burning of Lakeview made such a big blaze that it was observed for over 100 miles in several directions. Citizens of Klamath Falls, over 100 miles west of Lakeview, noticed the heavens illumed and it was remarked at once that Lakeview must be burning. Silver Lake, 100 miles north, saw the fire and it was thought to be Lakeview. Alturas, sixty miles south, and Cedarville, seventy miles southeast, both saw the fire.

No lives were lost, but the excitement, worry, overwork and smoke nearly proved fatal in several cases. Many people lost all they had on earth, saving only what they had on their backs.

The fire started about 8:30 o'clock in the evening, when a large part of the population was gathered at the town hall, where there was being held a Republican mass meeting. It started in the upper story of Hotel Lakeview, and the origin of the conflagration is a mystery to this day. When the alarm was given the fire had gained considerable headway and there was no possible chance to save the building. It seemed but a moment until the flames were leaping to the sky and fire brands flying in all directions, causing many brave hearts to quake.

From the Lakeview House the fire spread in all four directions, taking first Hart & Beach's store on the north, Charles Tonningsen's stable on the west, Beall & Willey's drug store on the south, and J. Frankl's residence on the east. Many thought the brick bank would stop the conflagration on the north, but it was not to be. Following the bank, George Ayers' store, J. W. Howard's store, Chas. Graves' shoe shop, E. Lake's bicycle shop, Peter Post's residence, occupied by E. M. Brattain, and several buildings in the near vicinity belonging to W. K. Barry were in flames while the fire was raging in the other direction.

South from the Lakeview House, Beall & Willey's drug store, H. Schminck's hardware, postoffice, Dunlap's variety store, C. U. Snider's store, A. Devine's barber shop, H. C. Rothe & Co.'s general merchandise store and Bailey & Massingill's general merchandise store were in the path of the flames. Dr. Dewey's office was the limit south on the east side of Water street. Every building on the blocks between Main and Water streets from the court house north to the old Racket store and old meat market building were consumed. The buildings destroyed in this section were the Commercial hotel and contents, Whorton & Fitzpatrick's saloon, Hong Sang's restaurant, Lakeview Drug Company's drug store, Ahlstrom Bros.'s Monogram, B. Reynolds's store, city hall, I. O. O. F. hall, bowling alley and soda works, Tonningsen's stable and residence overhead, J. Aviragnete's barber shop, Henckle & Turpin's saloon, Lakeview brewery saloon, L. B. Whorton's vegetable store, Coulter & Co.'s meat market, G. S. Easter's jewelry store, Lakeview Rustler office, Lakeview brewery, Osmus Tonningsen's residence, G. Schlagel's blacksmith shop, and harness and saddlery store, Geo. Jammerthal's saloon, B. Daly's barn and residence, occupied by Mr. Tetro.

On the west side of Main street from and including Mrs. Coulter's hotel, followed Harris & Sublette's furniture store, the Masonic hall and Magilton's hardware store, Mrs. Aviragnete's residence and Beiber & Field's store. Numerous sheds and small buildings, ice houses, etc., were included. Quite a number of people occupied upstairs rooms and offices, among them Dr. Demorest's dental office over C. U. Snider's store, the land office over the bank, and a number of roomers in the Miller building. Post & King's saloon, Frank Smith and the telegraph office were located in the Lakeview House, and Frank Gunther's jewelry store was in the Monogram.

The fire was a great blow at the time, but the citizens were not discouraged and they at once set about to rebuild the town. Merchants left at once for the cities to purchase new stocks of goods, contracts were let for the erection of new business houses, and every one seemed imbued with the idea that Lakeview must be rebuilt, and in a more substantial manner than before. At the time of the fire the business portion of Lakeview, including Water and Main streets, was composed almost entirely of wooden structures. In the whole town there were only four brick buildings.

By the first of October the town was largely rebuilt. There were then fifteen handsome brick buildings standing and three others were in course of construction. Commenting on the rebuilding of Lakeview, the Examiner said: "And look at Lakeview today! Within the few short months, attended by many adverse circumstances and unavoidable inconveniences, a wonderful transformation has taken place. Where stood the gloomy ruins now stand solid brick blocks, the wonder of man's skill and living monuments to the enterprise of proud citizens."

Lakeview is today one of the best builded towns in Oregon, certainly the best in interior Oregon. The fire of May 22, 1900, will never be forgotten, but its disastrous effects have been overcome, and the fire has produced the direct result of a better Lakeview.

On November 23, 1902, Lakeview was visited by another fire, which, but for the newly installed water system, would have done much damage. The losses were about as follows: W. K. Barry, hotel building, $7,000; L. F. Winkleman, furniture and supplies, $2,500; C. Henkle, saloon, $400; Geo. Jammerthal, residence, $800; S. N. Guilliams, barn and hay $150; town of Lakeview, $100; J. Aviragnete, $150.

The population of Lakeview, according to the federal census of 1900, was 761. Since then there has been a slight increase and the population is now estimated at between 800 and 1000. The years since the fire have been prosperous ones. Peace and plenty have been the lot of the town and its citizens. When the government irrigation project in southern Lake county shall have been completed and the iron horse has entered the town, Lakeview will take on metropolitan airs and become a city. Until then it will continue to be one of the best towns in the interior.

Lakeview is one of the strongest lodge towns in interior Oregon and supports some eight or ten of the best secret organizations.

The first lodge to be organized in the town was Odd Fellows Lodge, No. 63. On April 26, 1878, George Conn, Abram Tenbrook, George H. Penland, William Tullock, B. F. Barnum and R. S. Parker made application for a charter. Dispensation was granted these brothers of the three links, and on May 13, 1878, the lodge was instituted. A good membership was soon gained and the lodge progressed rapidly. In the early part of 1886 the members of the Odd Fellows lodge started a movement for the organization of a higher degree in Odd Fellowship, and on May 18 of that year a charter was granted to Lakeview encampment No. 18. The charter members were S. P. Moss, William Tullock, Frank W. Beach, A. McCallen, Dr. H. Wright, B. F. Barnum, T. W. Colvin, A. F. Snelling, John Simmons, A. Fitts, R. S. Parker, V. L. Snelling, O. L. Stanley, William Townsend and H. R. Heryford. The camp, like the subordinate lodge, prospered. Being the only camp in southeastern Oregon, it gained members from all over that section of the country and from Northern California. The property and records of the encampment burned with the hall in the big fire of 1900. Immediately thereafter the order started out with more zeal than ever and now supports a strong lodge.

Some time after the organization of the Odd Fellows lodge its members and their wives began preliminary work for organizing a Rebekah degree. The exact date of the issuance of the charter cannot be obtained, as the date of the original charter is not given in the duplicate charter issued after the fire. Dispensation was granted and a charter issued to the following persons: Brothers A. Fitts, C. U. Snider, B. F. Barnum, O. L. Stanley, William Tullock, T. W. Colvin, George P. Lovegrove, Frank W. Beach, F. P. Light, H. R. Heryford, C. Henkle, John Simmons, W. M. Townsend, J. Frankl, and Sisters R. F. Stanley, S. P. Moss, Ann Barnum, A. R. Tullock, Flora J. Stanley, M. L. Heryford, L. A.

Colvin, N. C. Parker, Frances Colvin, Anna Wright, E. P. Steel, M. Simmons and Mrs. Townsend, for Lakeview Rebekah Lodge No. 22. A duplicate charter was granted May 25, 1900.

George Conn, William Denny and Abram Tenbrook applied to the grand lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Oregon for a dispensation and charter for a Masonic lodge in Lakeview. The dispensation was granted on June 12, 1878, and George Conn was made master, William Denny senior warden and Abram Tenbrook junior warden. There were about twelve charter members.

Some time after the institution of the Masonic lodge agitation for an Eastern Star lodge was commenced, and on April 19, 1883, a dispensation was granted to Martha Hammersley, Maggie Evans, L. A. Huff, Martha Bonebrake, Fannie Burrus, Mary J. Hanks, Lucinda Follett, J. B. Phelps, S. Hertzog, Mary Ramson, Orville Harrington, Kate Hutton, Lovina A. Blair, C. E. Down, N. J. Lesieur, E. Penland, Katie Dunlap, Carrie Phelps and Jennie Phelps for Oriental Chapter No. 5. J. Frankl was the first worthy patron, Louisa A. Blair worthy matron, and Martha Bonebrake associate worthy matron. A new charter was issued on July 20, 1894.

In October, 1886, Lakeside lodge No. III, Ancient Order of United Workmen, was organized in Lakeview. The first officers were: James Clarkson, P. W. M.; C. A. Beach, M. W.; C. U. Snider, foreman; W. T. Boyd, recorder; William Townsend, financier; George P. Lovegrove, receiver.

So well did the A. O. U. W. lodge flourish that it was soon decided to organize the auxiliary lodge and Lakeshore Lodge No. 77, Degree of Honor, came into existence with the following first officers: Mary E. Snider, P. C. of H.; Frances Burrus, L. of H.; Lillie Harris, recorder; Anna Sherlock, receiver; Nellie Snelling, J. W.; Anna M. Milon, C. of H.; Frances P. Bieber, C. of C.; Minnie L. Willits, financier; Lulu Maxwell, L. U.; T. S. Handley, O. W.

Court Pinewood Lodge No. 8530, Ancient Order of Foresters, came into existence October 5, 1896, and started off under very favorable circumstances. The charter was granted to William Gunther, S. F. Ahlstrom, B. Daly, E. C. Ahlstrom and H. Schminck.

Lakeview Camp No. 526, Woodmen of the World, was the next to come into existence in the town, the charter being granted October 3, 1899. The first officers installed were: Ashley Follet, consel commander; Thomas Cloud, banker; M. A. Striplin, escort; Joseph Judge, sentry; A. A. Graham, master lieutenant; J. M. Batchelder, clerk; C. Linebarger, watchman; T. V. Hall, physician; H. M. Stoutenyer, O. F. Demorest and H. C. Whitworth, managers.

Solace Circle No. 374, Women of Woodcraft, was organized soon after the W. O. W. Following were the first officers: Lillie C. Harris, advisor; Ella Rehart, magician; B. M. Blair, musician; Sadie A. Linebarger, past guardian neighbor; Mollie McGarry, clerk; Ida M. Striplin, attendant; Annette Cheney, inner sentinel; Lucy T. Sublette, guardian neighbor; Maggie C. Bernard, banker; Anna E. Sherlock, captain of guards; C. P. Linebarger, outer sentinel; E. H. Smith, physician; E. F. Cheney, Bessie Combs and J. H. Tonnehill, managers.

The last fraternal order to be organized in Lakeview was Rimrock Aerie, No. 777, Fraternal Order of Eagles, which came into existence December 1, 1904, with fifty-one charter members. The dispensation was granted to L. N. Brautlacht.

Lakeview supports two churches and each organization owns its own place of worship and conducts regular services.

PAISLEY.

Second in size to Lakeview of Lake county towns is Paisley, a town of from 250 to 300 people, forty miles north of the county seat and about 140 north of the nearest railroad point, Madeline, California. To the north it is about 200 miles to the nearest railroad point, Shaniko, and nearly the same distance to Pokegama, its nearest point to the west. The town is the nearest one to the geographical center of the county, and the people hope that some day their town will be designated the county's seat of government.

Paisley is located on the Chewaucan river near the foothills, and its site is one of great beauty. In fact nature seems to have placed all her resources under tribute to create this little paradise. The town is on the south side of the river, which is here heavily fringed with a growth of cottonwood timber. The elevation above sea level is 4,550 feet.

Approaching the town from the north the first glimpse of Paisley by the stage bound passenger brings an exclamation of surprise to the lips as with his face to the south he ascends a small eminence from a level plain and the sudden vision of beauty is revealed. Hidden in the luxuriance of nature's growth, among orchards and shady poplar, beside the beautiful, sparkling river of the Chewaucan here spanned by a large bridge, with the smoke from fifty homes and firesides gently floating on the balmy and exhilarating air down the valley, the town presents to him a picture of beauty that would defy the skill of an artist to reproduce or the word painter to describe. On the west of Paisley rise tall, majestic mountains, adorned with fragrant forests of the stately pine and fir, relieved by canyons and high cliffs, among which sunshine and shadow chase in and out, picturing alternately the light and shade in seeming fantastic pleasure upon the water of the river, making a scene sublime. To the south lies the low, level valley of the Chewaucan and to the north opens a practically level country for miles which terminates upon the desert beyond and which contains thousands of acres. Paisley is situated like Reno, Nevada. One is on the Chewaucan, the other is on the Truckee, both streams flowing from the high Sierras to fill lakes on the desert.

Three general merchandise stores, a drug store, a blacksmith shop, livery stable, saloon, barber shop, brickyard, carpenter shop and a first-class hotel cater to the wants of the people. A flouring mill run by water power stands on the banks of the river. The district supports a good school and there is one church in the town, the Methodist. The Masons, Eastern Star, Odd Fellows, Woodmen of the World and Circle of Woodcraft have lodges here. The growth of Paisley has not been rapid, but it has been substantial. It is an excellent trading point and one of the prosperous towns of the county.

The first settlers in the Chewaucan valley, in which Paisley is located, came in 1871. Among the earliest were Root & Hoskins, who drove in a band of cattle from California, and a Mr. Gillespie. One or two others came that year and a few the next year, among them N. A. King of Portland, who brought in cattle and located on the marsh. By 1873 there was quite a settlement in the valley.

In 1876 a mail route was established through this interior country from The Dalles, by way of Prineville and Silver Lake, to Lakeview with weekly mail service. That same year a post-office was established four miles south of the present site of Paisley and named Chewaucan. It was at the home of T. J. Brattain and that gentleman was postmaster. The following year the postoffice was moved to John Blair's ranch, six miles farther south, and Mr. Blair officiated as postmaster until he resigned about four years later, when the office was discontinued.

The site upon which afterwards was built the town of Paisley was state land, having been obtained from the government as agricultural college lands. Three eighties, upon part of which the town was afterwards laid out, were purchased from the state by Messrs. Averill, J. P. Cochran and Robert Drinkwater. The first business house of the future town was a store started in 1878 by George Steele and J. P. Cochran. Unlike many of the first enterprises of a new town, this store was quite a pretentious affair, the stock put in being valued at about $10,000. The goods were freighted in from Red Bluff, California, and until the railroad was built to Redding the store was obliged to secure all its stock from that far away town.

Soon after the establishment of the store a postoffice named Paisley was granted and George Steele was made postmaster. The name was suggested by Charles Mitchell Innes, a native of Scotland, and was named after the Paisley of Scotland. During the year 1878 other enterprises were started and a little village began to make its appearance on the marsh. A blacksmith shop was opened by Graham & Hamliry. T. J. Brattain opened a hotel and feed stable, and in the fall a school house was erected. This latter was a big help in the building up of the town. A nine months' school was maintained, and the surrounding settlers would come to the little town and make their homes there during the winter months that their children might have the advantages of the school. In the spring of 1879 Paisley business houses were added to by the opening of a saloon by J. Fickle.

Paisley was platted May 2, 1879, by S. G. Steele and John P. Cochran, but the plat was not filed until December 14, 1879. The site was surveyed by J. H. Evans. It consisted of four blocks. Running north and south were three streets named Willow, Main and Chewaucan. The blocks were separated by one street running east and west—Mill street. Additions have since been platted as follows: South, East and West additions, October 1, 1881, by J. P. Cochran, William F. Mah and E. H. Morgan; Second addition, July 16, 1883, by J. P. Cochran, William F. Mah and E. H. Morgan; West, Second North and Second South additions, June 27, 1889, by Herman J. Sadler, Minnie C. Sadler, J. P. Cochran and Mary E. Cochran.

A second store was opened in 1881 by George Conn. Two years later Virgil Conn bought an interest and later acquired the whole business. George Conn then established the third store in Paisley. An important move forward in the history of the town was the building of a flouring mill in the early eighties by George and Virgil Conn. It is said that 250 barrels of flour were manufactured the first year—quite a record for that period of the county's development.

Since its founding the growth of Paisley has not been rapid. It is now and always has been the trading point for a vast section of country in central Lake county and the educational center for the same region.

NEW PINE CREEK.

Third in size and importance of the towns of Lake county is New Pine Creek, the state line town, situated fifteen miles southeast of Lakeview, in the most fertile and productive part of Goose Lake valley. It is the nearest to a railroad of any town in Lake county, being only seventy miles north of Madeline, California.

Surrounded as it is by a large scope of agricultural country, New Pine Creek is an important business point, and the volume of its business compares favorably with that of any town of like size in Oregon. It has a population of 150 or 200 people. There are two general merchandise stores, a drug store, two hotels, two feed stables, a blacksmith shop, barber shop and meat market. A good school is maintained here and there are three church organizations, Methodist, Baptist and Christian.

New Pine Creek is one of the best locations for a town in Southern Oregon or Northern California. It is beautifully situated with the majestic hills to the east and Goose lake to the west. The scenery is truly magnificent. In a few hours travel in the warmest months of the year one can ride to the summit of a mountain to the delightful Cave lake and mineral spring, where the atmosphere is uncomfortably cold at night without a good supply of wraps and bedding. The town-site is certainly a model one, with its broad stretch of bottom land converging to the magnificent Goose lake, with its pretty mountain scenery, with the great level plateau leading down from the foot of the mountains, with its splendid water power and natural irrigation facilities dashing down its canyons. It is a garden spot.

New Pine Creek despite its name, is the oldest town of Lake county. The first settlers to the county came to Goose Lake valley and the greater part of these settled in that part of the valley near the Oregon-California state line, some in one state and some in another. In the history chapter we have told of these early settlements and shall not repeat the events of the valley in treating of the town that afterwards came into existence there.

Although the name, New Pine Creek, was not officially applied to a town or post office until in the early seventies, there was a business house on the state line near the present town so early as 1869. That year Desible, Powley and King started a store, which, however, ran only a few weeks. In 1871 a flouring mill was built by Joseph Robnette, about one-half mile west of the store location. The mill was necessarily of the old-fashioned, primitive style, in which burrs were used. Mr. Robnette operated the mill four seasons and then sold to A. Z. Hammersley. The latter ran it until July 1, 1879, when the State Line Milling Company was organized and took over the interests of Mr. Hammersley. The members of this company were Luke Mulkey, Joseph Robnette, Enoch Loper, Stephen P. Moss and Johnson Mulkey.

But before these changes in the mill property had taken place New Pine Creek had gained an official standing and had become entitled to a place on the map. In 1872 the mail route asked for by the Oregon legislature having been granted by the Washington authorities, the settlers of the Pine Creek country petitioned the postoffice department for the establishment of a postoffice in their valley to be called Pine Creek. The petition was favorably acted upon and Lake county's first postoffice came into existence. Owing to the fact that there was at the time one postoffice in Oregon named Pine Creek, another of the same name could not be established, so the authorities made out the commission under the title of New Pine Creek, and as such it has always been known. S. A. Hammersley was the first postmaster, and the office was maintained at his house. The office remained at this point until 1897, when it was moved a half mile east to its present location.

When the State Line Milling Company purchased the mill in 1879, it opened a store at New Pine Creek and the following year the townsite was platted. The site was surveyed by Frank M. Cheesman and was platted December 16, 1880, by Enoch Loper and his wife, Mary E. Loper. The original townsite consisted of eight blocks. The streets north and south were named Center and West, and those east and west were Mill street, Church street and State Line avenue. The townsite is located just north of the California line, one of the streets touching the line. There have been no additions platted.

The State Line Milling Company sold the store in 1883 to B. W. Rees, who conducted it two years and then moved it to Lakeview. In 1884 the company also sold the mill property to J. R. Hammersley. The latter ran it until 1900, when he sold to A. M. Smith, and the latter to E. Keller. From the date of the removal of Mr. Rees' store to Lakeview up to 1890 there was no store at New Pine Creek, and the town during these years consisted only of the postoffice and the mill.

On the latter date some of the farmers in the vicinity formed a corporation and opened at New Pine Creek a cooperative store. Farmers' cooperative business ventures are seldom successful and this was no exception to the rule. Although it was not a prosperous venture, the store continued to exist for some time. Ben Warner, one of the supporters of the corporation, finally came into possession of the store, and about 1898 the remnants of the cooperative store were sold to Lemons & Hartzog. These gentlemen conducted a general merchandise business a couple of years, and the business then passed into the hands of Fleming & Hartzog. In 1903 Fleming Bros. bought the store and still conduct it. Another store was started in 1897 by Stanley McLaughlin, who shortly afterwards sold to Capt. Follett, and the latter to his son, Eb. Follett. The stock was finally closed out.

The town of New Pine Creek did not grow to any extent until about 1900. The mill, store and postoffice constituted the town until the general prosperity of late years has caused it to grow to some extent. The year 1900 was a prosperous one and at the beginning of 1901 we find there are two general merchandise stores, a hotel, blacksmith shop, livery stable and several residences. A petition was circulated in 1901 asking for a change in the name of the postoffice from New Pine Creek to Orcal, but the proposed name did not prove popular with the citizens and was not made. "Orcal" is made up of the abbreviations of the two states upon the dividing line of which the town is built, but despite the novelty of the name, the old fashioned one of New Pine Creek was considered good enough.

Several attempts have been made to start a saloon in the state line town, but the sentiment against it is strong, and so far the attempts have been unsuccessful.

SILVER LAKE.

Silver Lake is the most northerly town of Lake county. It is one of the most interesting points in Oregon in many ways. Its remoteness from railroads, its natural surroundings, its varied resources, make it an important factor in the development of Inland Oregon. It has been called the "Gateway to the Oregon Desert."

If there is a town in the United States which is farther from a railroad than Silver Lake, its whereabouts is unknown to the writer. Its nearest point is Shaniko, 170 miles distant to the north. To the west the nearest point reached by wagon road is Eugene, about the same distance. To the south is Madeline, California, nearly 200 miles away, while to the east the distance to a railroad is much greater.

Within a radius of twenty-five miles of Silver Lake are to be found some rich farming lands, the greater portion of which can be easily irrigated. The village is a thriving little community and will continue on the map of Oregon as a town of more or less importance for all time to come. While the citizens of Silver Lake and vicinity are very ambitious, they do not insist that their town is about to become the metropolis of eastern Oregon. The place has a population of about 100 people. It is situated on Silver creek, and has an elevation of 4,300 feet above sea level.

The town supports two general merchandise stores, a newspaper, a hotel, livery stable, blacksmith shop, shoemaker's shop and a saloon. There is one church, the Methodist, and one lodge, the Woodmen of the World, organized in February, 1899. A good school is also maintained here.

Although the town of Silver Lake did not come into existence until the middle eighties, there was some little settlement in Silver Lake valley in the seventies. During the winter of 1874-5 a postoffice named Silver Lake was established on the lake of the same name at the home of G. C. Duncan, nine miles east of the present site of the town. The postoffice was in the little log cabin belonging to Mr. Duncan and that gentleman was postmaster. The office continued in existence for many years, being discontinued about 1881. In 1882 the office was re-established at the ranch of C. P. Marshall, about one and one-half miles west of the present town, and Mr. Marshall was the postmaster.

The site of the present town of Silver Lake was government land until it was settled upon by Mr. H. F. West under the preemption laws in 1884. Here Mr. West built a little cabin and lived for a time. Later he took up a homestead and moved his cabin onto that.

For the convenience of the settlers in the Silver Lake country and as a business proposition, in the fall of 1885 J. P. Roberts, who had previously been engaged in the mercantile business at Linkville and Merganser, in the Klamath country, freighted in a stock of goods and opened a store. This was just west of the present site of the town. The store was conducted in a little log building, and the stock was valued at about $1000. Mr. Roberts was not successful in his venture and the business went into the hands of a receiver. Mr. Johnson, the receiver, took charge of the store in February, 1886.

In the fall of 1886 the first business house on the land now platted as the townsite of Silver Lake was established. This was the Silver Lake hotel, put up and run by George Elliott and wife. A feed barn was put up about the same time and was run by Mr. Elliott in connection with the hotel. A little later Mr. Johnson moved the Roberts store over to a point opposite the hotel and the new town boasted two business houses. The Roberts stock of goods was closed out in the spring of 1887.

The fall of 1886 witnessed the establishment of the second store. This was put in by J. H. Clayton. Shortly afterwards the postoffice was moved from the Marshall ranch to the Clayton store and U. F. Abshier was appointed postmaster. He was succeeded by R. S. Mansearh, and in 1891 F. M. Chrisman became postmaster, which position he has held ever since.

About the time of the establishment of the Clayton store the citizens of the surrounding country raised $700 by subscription and established a school at Silver Lake, which was at that time the pride of the settlement, and it may be said that the Silver Lake school has ever since been an institution in which the people take pride. Fifteen scholars attended the first term.

In 1887 several new enterprises were established in the little town. Milton Brown that year purchased the stock of the Roberts store, freighted in a lot of new goods, built a two thousand dollar building and started a general merchandise store. He continued in business until 1891. A saloon was also established that year by F. A. Duncan and Felix Green.

Silver Lake was platted October 19, 1888, by H. F. West and his wife, Emogene West. It was surveyed October 19 by Lincoln Taylor, surveyor. The site consisted of fifteen blocks. North and south the streets are First, Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth. East and west the streets are named Main, Center and South.

Sam Allison started a blacksmith shop in 1888, thus filling a long felt want in the little town. In 1890 F. M. Chrisman purchased a one-half interest in the store of J. H. Clayton. Two years later W. A. Chrisman bought Mr. Clayton's interest, and in 1894 F. M. Chrisman became sole owner of the business which he still conducts. A second store was established in 1892 by J. C. Conn, which he ran until his death in 1904.

During the year 1894 we find that Silver Lake had grown to be a town of about fifty people. On Christmas eve of that year occurred the most horrible catastrophe that has ever taken place in a town the size of Silver Lake, and one of the most terrible that ever occurred in the history of Oregon,—the death of forty-three people in an awful holocaust. That number of persons taken out of a small community leaves vacancies in the homes that will not be filled this generation.

On the evening of December 24 there were gathered at the J. H. Clayton hall, on the lower floor of which was the store of Chrisman Bros., between 175 and 200 people, come together for the Christmas eve festivities. A well arranged program had been prepared and the exercises were drawing to a close. The applause of the audience was resounding throughout the hall, showing the appreciation of the entertainment. All were happy and free from care that night. But how soon a time of pleasure and enjoyment can be replaced by one of the darkest despair! How quickly unsuspecting souls can be hurled into eternity!

The persons who were to take part in the last number of the entertainment were behind the curtain preparing for their appearance, when some one in the audience, wishing either to get a better view or to leave the room, arose and walked across the benches. In doing so he accidentally struck the hanging lamp with his head, which threw some of the oil into the burner. This immediately ignited and a burst of flame shot to the ceiling. Francis M. Chrisman, who was seated near by, rushed to the blazing lamp, succeeding in getting it from its frame, and started to carry it to the door.

He doubtless would have averted the terrible calamity that followed had he been left alone. But, as is usual in a case of this kind, the audience became excited and then panic stricken. The courage of Mr. Chrisman and a few others who calmly attempted to carry the burning lamp from the thronged hall was made useless by the excited crowd, which dashed it from Mr. Chrisman's hands, scattering death and destruction in its path. Of what avail is human forethought in an emergency of this kind, when reason gives way and not even thought of self-preservation exists?

When Mr. Chrisman started for the door with the burning lamp the excited ones began to strike it with hats, coats and whatever came handy. The lamp was knocked from Mr. Chrisman's grasp and rolled upon the floor, a burning, seething mass. When a realization of the dangerous state of affairs began to dawn upon the excited and horrified people, a bold dash was made for liberty.

For a very short space of time, while the burning lamp lay near the door, there was comparative quiet, although even then women and children and some few of the men were being held back by other who were cooler. Possibly the disaster might have been less direful had not some one jumped through the flames and reached the door, thus exciting others to imitate him. A young lady approached the fire's edge, doubtless with the intention of attempting an escape in the same manner. She hesitated for a moment as if about to leap, when a tongue of flame reached out and caught her dress. Some of the less excited people went to her rescue and in that way their attention was taken from those whom they were restraining.

It is not known whether it was because of the imprisoned ones' belief that the only avenue of escape was through the doorway, or because the sight of the lady's burning apparel moved them to a frenzy of fear—perhaps both—that caused the wild rush to the door. A little girl, at a disadvantage from her stature, was pushed or fell down and was trod upon. Her mother cried: "For God's sake, don't trample on my child," and bending to lift her, was herself forced down by the crowd. Others stumbled over them, and the flames from the oily floor enveloped them as they did all who fell.

The building in which the catastrophe occurred was a two-story structure, about 24x50 feet. There was only one small door that opened from the inside, and this was approached from the outside by a narrow flight of stairs. The door was in the rear of the building. The only other means of escape were two windows, both in the front end of the hall. After the first rush of the crowd for the door in its mad effort to escape, a burning death had been made, a rush was made for the windows.

The rudely constructed benches that were in the center of the hall greatly impeded the progress of escape. At the first onslaught the blockade at the door and windows was so great that it was necessary for help inside and outside to break the jam and effect escape. Under the burden of men rushing from the hell of sudden flame the stairs fell to the ground, and those who escaped thereafter fell from the landing to the ground, a distance of about thirteen feet.

The windows offered no deliverance except through flame and smoke that few human beings could withstand, but the stifling, shrieking, crazed victims in the blazing passage attempted to stagger thither, many to fall to rise no more. Some, however, escaped from this outlet, being aided greatly by a small porch under the windows. It was on this porch that Walter Duncan stood and helped several to safety. Instead of jumping off when pulled out, they stood there until about twenty had been rescued, when the porch gave way and all fell to the ground. A ladder was then placed at the windows, but only two more persons were saved from the windows after the porch fell. In his testimony before the coroner's jury Mr. Duncan said of this rescue at the windows.

I broke out one of the front windows and spoke to some ladies that were standing on the stage to come that way. I threw myself out on the porch and pulled them out. I think I must have helped out about fifteen persons, big and little. One man came through the window, when I heard my wife scream on the inside: "For God's sake, pull me out; I am burning up." I reached my arms and body through the window and got hold of her, the smoke coming out of the window at the time. Just then the porch gave way and we fell to the sidewalk. I hallooed for a ladder and then raised my wife up, and she said: "Where is our baby?" I left her and ran around the house to the stairway. When I got there I saw that all hope of getting any one out at the door was gone, as the blaze was coming out of the door twenty feet high. I found my boy there alive. A ladder was put up in front and just two persons, Mrs. Busick and Roy Ward, were saved after the porch fell.

It was hardly more than two minutes after the lamp fell until the entire building was aflame. everything was in a turmoil of excitement and commotion. Some were calling loudly for loved ones that could not be found. Some were rushing hither and thither through the blinding heat and smoke and flame, trying to find some means of escape from the prison of flames. Some knelt down and prayed, while others, so overcome by the suddenness of the dangerous situation, fainted and fell prostrate in the flames. One who went through this terrible ordeal has written of the few minutes of hell:

The scene can not be imagined by one not actually present at this or some similar catastrophe. Now and then for an instant when the thought of self or the help of others was not uppermost, some expression of face would catch your eye and leave its impression on your memory forever. In many a face was the expression of terror mingled with pain and fear. On top, trying to crawl over those erect, could be seen some with eyes protruding. One such sight leaves with you a memory never to be forgotten. The expression of those eyes said plainer than any words, and said nothing else: "Life! Life! I must have life!"

Amid this scene, however, there were examples of manly courage. One man who tried to rescue a little girl whose clothing was on fire and who undoubtedly would have been trampled upon in another moment, hurriedly went to her assistance, picked her up on his shoulder, at the same time trying with his bare hands to smother the fire which was rapidly consuming her garments, the flames from which all the time lapped his head and face. He remained cool and was apparently aware of the selfishness of pushing onward or backward to the injury of others. Suddenly he was seen to stagger and sink, evidently having inhaled the flames from the girl's burning clothing. Appeals for help were heartrending.

When the last of the rescued were pulled from the building not a sound or a moan was to be heard above the roar and crackling of the flames. The gas doubtless produced instant suffocation, and the forty odd souls that perished in the death trap met their death without suffering after the first terrible agony. Further rescue was impossible and those who had escaped were obliged to stand and witness the terrible scene. It was one of the most horrible, ghastly spectacles that was ever presented to the human gaze. Nearly all who were present had relatives or friends who were being consumed before their very eyes. It was truly a heart-rending and sickening sight to behold.

Forty persons met their death that night and three died from the effects of the fire two or three months later. The forty-three victims of the holocaust were:

Immediate attention was given to the injured and suffering, and the entire village was turned into a hospital. Couriers were at once dispatched to Summer Lake, Paisley and Lakeview, and assistance came from all over the county. Everything was done that willing hands could do to alleviate the suffering of the injured. Drs. Thompson of Silver Lake and Daly of Lakeview attended to the injured. In getting to the scene of the disaster, Dr. Daly accomplished a feat never performed before in Oregon. In twenty-four hours he rode over 200 miles across vales and mountains, the snow girth deep in a hundred places and the thermometer below zero.

The charred remains were gathered and a few days later the funeral was held, the remains being buried in one coffin.

A coroner's inquest was held, whose findings were as follows:

We, the coroner's jury empaneled to ascertain the cause of the death of the following deceased persons, to wit: * * * do find that the said deceased persons above mentioned were residents of Silver Lake, Lake county, Oregon, and that said deceased persons mentioned above came to their death on Dec. 24, 1894, by being burned by fire while in Chrisman's hall, when the said hall was accidentally consumed by fire; and we find that the cause of death was accidental.

In 1898 a handsome monument was erected in the cemetery at Silver Lake in honor of the memory of those who met their death in the awful holocaust.

The growth of Silver Lake during the nineties was not rapid. It continued to be the trading point for the immense, but thinly settled, country surrounding. During later years, however, the town has advanced to some extent. In 1901 the town had its first telephone, when a company of local people built a line to Lakeview, ninety-eight miles long.

The year 1904 was an exceptionally prosperous one for the little town. The country surrounding was settled upon quite extensively, the timber land in the vicinity was taken up and the town felt the effect. A few new enterprises were started and several new residences were built.

ADEL.

Adel is the name of a postoffice on Deep creek, thirty-five miles due east of Lakeview. In addition to the postoffice there is also a store owned by J. J. Monroe. A tri-weekly stage operates between Adel and Fort Bidwell, and the office has a tri-weekly mail. The postoffice was established in 1896.

PLUSH.

Plush postoffice is located on Warner lake at the mouth of Honey creek, forty miles northeast of Lakeview. There is one general merchandise store in Plush owned by Daniel Boone.

SUMMER LAKE.

Summer Lake is a postoffice and stage station sixty-five miles northwest of Lakeview.

WARNER LAKE.

Warner Lake is a country postoffice situated near the southern end of Warner lake, twenty-two miles southeast of Lakeview. It has a tri-weekly mail and is connected by stage with Plush, Lakeview and Fort Bidwell.

CHAPTER V

DESCRIPTIVE.

Most appropriately named is Lake county. It is in the center of the great lake country of Central Oregon, where are located some of the most remarkable bodies of water in the world. This county lies in the central southern portion of the state, about midway between the eastern and western boundaries. On the north it is bounded by Crook and on the east by Harney county, on the south by the states of California and Nevada, and on the west by Kalamath, which latter was at one time a part of Lake county.

Regarding its area it stands third in the state, having a trifle over 8,000 square miles. Malheur county has 9,784 and Harney 9,986 square miles. Its length is about one hundred and fifteen miles and its width east and west is eighty miles. Some idea of these figures is obtained by comparison. When the statement is made that its area is 8,000 square miles, a correct understanding of its size may not be gained, but when it is said that Lake county is larger than Delaware, larger than Rhode Island, larger than Connecticut, larger than New Jersey, and about the size of Massachusetts its proportions become clearer and more distinct. Yet in all this vast area are living about 3,000 people only. Compare this with the conditions in the states just named, and stronger grows the belief that there is room for more people in Lake county.

The county contains 5,230,080 acres divided as follows: 1,986,048 acres of agricultural land; 1,124,352 acres of grazing land; 1,152,000 acres of timber land; 714,240 acres unsurveyed land and 253,440 acres covered by lakes of which 80,000 acres can be drained. The land approved and deeded amounts to 1,000,000. There are temporarily withdrawn from settlement 1,801,550 acres. There were on January 1, 1905, 2,346,293 acres of government land in Lake county opened to settlement. The county is situated at an average height of 4,500 feet above sea level. Generally the country is mountainous interspersed with numerous large, and countless small and fertile valleys. On the mountains is an abundance of grass and hundreds of thousands head of stock are there pasturing continuously. The land is well adapted to agricultural purposes, but scarcely sufficient has been cultivated to supply local demands. Professor E. B. Cope, a high geological authority, has written concerning the formation of Lake county:

"The whole country appears to have been covered at some not very remote geological period, by a great sheet of lava, which has been cracked, uplifted and depressed in various proportions; almost every plateau ends in an escarpment of naked basalt, known throughout that region as rimrock, perhaps, geologically, the most characteristic feature of the county; nearly every valley is enclosed in such formation."

There are numerous natural hot springs scattered throughout Lake county, in which eggs may be boiled hard within two minutes. There are fine forests of timber, numerous saw mills, great cattle ranches, an abundance of water flowing through the mountain canyons all the year round. In the way of sport and pleasure there are the finest fishing pools and camping places in the northwest. Here can be found on the summit of the mountain, at an elevation of 8,000 feet, a lake of crystal water abounding in mountain trout, and at the edge a mineral spring the waters of which are said to possess remarkable curative powers. At Summer lake a river bubbles forth from the ground and courses through the valley. Bands of antelope numbering in the hundreds scurry over the hills and the big mule deer can be found in numbers anywhere on the mountains and foothills. Here may be found majestic mountains, mazes of sylvan solitude and poetic silence, broken only by the murmurs of the sad and solemn pines; sparkling streamlets ripple and sing, weaving through myriad-tinted meadows like threads of silver hair. In the way of majestic, picturesque scenery nature has contributed bountifully to Lake county. While located among the mountains the county is interspersed with some of the finest valleys in Oregon, and only second in extent of area to the far-famed Willamette valley. Between these valleys are ridges and in some places mountains covered with juniper, fir, mahogany, and pine, shrubs and wild plums.

The principal valleys are Goose lake, North and South Warner, Chewaucan, Summer and Silver lake. These valleys cover an area of hundreds of square miles and are very productive. When properly cultivated all the soils of Lake county yield abundantly. The bottom lands are covered with native grasses and grow huge crops of alfalfa, as well as cereals and vegetables. There is no body of land, occupied or unoccupied, in Lake county that is farther than ten miles from timber. However, the county is so large and its resources and natural wonders so many and varied, that a general description would convey only a faint idea of them. It is our purpose to tell of each portion of the county in turn. First let us direct our attention to the several valleys which lie within the boundaries of the county.

One of the largest and most productive is Warner valley, the lands of which have been in continued litigation for so many years. As we have given a full account of this legal tangle in a preceding chapter we shall here confine ourselves to a simple description of the valley. It is located in the southeastern portion of the county, is about 70 miles long, north and south, by from four to ten miles wide, east and west. Warner, in fact comprises two valleys, North and South Warner, separated by what is called the Narrows. Running through the valley and into Warner lake are several large streams, the principal ones being Twenty-Mile creek, flowing into the lake from the south; Deep creek on the west, and Honey creek into North Warner from the west. While there are these streams flowing through the valley and into the lake, there are none flowing out, and the water goes into North Warner lake where it either evaporates or sinks.

This valley produces fruit of all kinds adapted to the climate, and all varieties of vegetables. Grain grows here as well as it does in any valley in Oregon, but on account of being so far from market very little is raised. The principal product of the valley is hay, where it grows in profusion, natural and tame. Warner valley, as you first see it, looking from the graded road of Deep Creek canyon, presents a beautiful view. The haystacks, so thickly dotted over the meadows, tell their own story of prosperity. The comfortable houses with their gardens and orchards, are pleasant features of the scene, and besides these are thousands of acres of land which are unquestionably swamp. Warner basin is a settling basin, and seems to occupy the bowl of an extinct crater, and is surrounded on the east, south and west by igneous rocks, chiefly brown basalt, which on its west side rises abruptly from 1,500 to 2,000 feet above the level of the basin. The existence of Warner basin is due, no doubt, to its having been within a zone of displacement of the earth's crust in a past period when near the border of an immense volcanic movement that once visited this region.

The Chewaucan basin is part of the Great Basin that covers parts of Utah, Nevada, California and Oregon, and which has no outlet to the sea. The Great Basin is divided into seven small basins, Sulton, Boneville, Lahonton, Owens, Mono and Chewaucan, each having no connection with the others. The Chewaucan is the most northerly of the smallest of these basins. From the headwaters of Crooked creek to the Silver lake summit is about 100 miles, and east and west from the rimrock east of Lake Abert to the rimrock west of Summer lake is about 60 miles. This rimrock is due to the faulting of the formation, and rises about 3,000 feet in places almost perpendicularly above the valley that lies between. In this valley there are between 150,000 and 200,000 acres of fine agricultural land and the basin is protected on all sides by high ranges. At one time this entire basin was covered by Lake Chewaucan. Its dessication has been marked by five distinct stages where the old shore lines can be plainly traced. During the glacial period the waters of this lake were from 300 to 400 feet deep where Paisley now stands, and extended nearly a hundred miles in length. The water has receded until all that is left is one small lake under the rimrock on either side of this basin. The origin of this basin was volcanic and the leaching of the volcanic rocks has impregnated the waters of these lakes with salt, soda and potash, just as has been done in varying degrees in each of the other divisions of the Great Basin. These salts will be valuable whenever a railroad offers a market. The Chewaucan basin has three principal divisions, Summer lake, Chewaucan marsh and Crooked creek. Clover flat is a small settlement higher up on the mountain, and there are several ranches on the Little Chewaucan.

Should one desire to view grand and impressive scenery let him climb the mountain on the east side of the Chewaucan valley, where he may feast his eyes on the great Shewaucan panorama, which in its entire length is 19 miles long by 7 miles wide. The elevation of Chewaucan marsh is 4,336 feet above sea level.

Goose lake valley is one of the largest and most productive. The entire section more resembles a middle west farming country than a Pacific Northwest farming and stock raising district. Grain, hay, fruits, berries, vegetables and melons grow there in abundance. It is an ideal valley and extends from the northern part of California northward to some distance above Lakeview. To the west of Goose lake is Drew's valley, a rich and productive section, 4,951 feet above sea level.

Summer and Silver lake valleys are, also, fertile spots in the county. The former, just beyond the Chewaucan, and over a crest of hills, is the paradise where fruit and berries grow abundantly and mature more rapidly than in any other section of Lake county. This valley hugs the rimrock mountains, and is a naturally sheltered spot where beautiful flowers mingle their fragrance with the lovely wild flowers of the foot hills. Here is the spot for the fruit grower, with high mountains to the west and a beautiful lake covering the heart of the valley. Here, also, many wealthy farmers and stock raisers have their homes. This valley was discovered in 1843 by General Fremont who named it Summer lake.

Silver lake valley, thirty miles north of Summer lake valley, is decidedly a stock country, and many extensive ranches are located within it. It lies close to the great desert and it has a fine outlet for stock. There are excellent agricultural lands here in abundance and a progressive people make up the community. Besides these there are a number of smaller valleys where agricultural pursuits are carried on to some extent. The whole northern part of the county is known as the "desert," and of this we shall have more to say later on. While these valley lands are well adapted to agricultural purposes only sufficient to supply local demands and to furnish the mills and stockmen has thus far been cultivated. This is because Lake county is remote from railway transportation, and there is no profit in raising grain and shipping to the outside. The soil is diversified, consisting of rich, black loam, sage brush loam of different grades and in some places it is sandy.

Irrigation is yet in its infancy in Lake county. Only a few ditches have been constructed and these are on a small scale. Subirrigation from lakes and streams is mostly depended upon at present. Water is going to waste that would be ample to irrigate all the valley lands of the county, and there are a sufficient number of ample reservoir sites to store the snows and rains of winter and spring to irrigate all the level lands of the region. The United States Reclamation Service engineers are making a careful investigation of the reservoir sites in the neighborhood of Lakeview. It is estimated that at least 200,000 acres of land can be reclaimed and irrigated in the county. All this land is not in one body like the Klamath Falls project, but it is quite as easy to reclaim, and at less cost per acre, because there are no vested water rights to be bought out as was the case in Klamath county. The engineers are, also, looking over the marsh and lake bottom lands that it is proposed to drain. The landholders have all expressed a willingness to promptly comply with the governmental conditions with reference to signing up their lands if by so doing they can induce the secretary of the Interior to approve of the project. According to the third annual report of the service—covering the years 1903 and 1904—and issued in 1905, the government has investigated three sections of Lake county with a possible view of undertaking government irrigation. These are the Chewaucan, Ana river and Silver lake projects. Concerning the Chewaucan project the report says:

The lands for the Chewaucan project lie generally north and east of Paisley and Chewaucan marsh, in the south central part of the state. Their elevation above sea level is approximately 4,500 feet. The lands to the east and north of Chewaucan marsh are very fertile and, for this altitude, unusually free from frosts. * * * The area of irrigable lands which can be covered by a gravity system is about 33,000 acres. * * * Owing to the high elevation late frosts frequently occur in the bottom lands and prevent the general cultivation of such vegetables as tomatoes and potatoes. Along the foothills, however, in the more protected places, all the fruits and products of the ordinary garden are grown. Two crops of alfalfa are now successfully raised. It is not believed that these lands, remote as they are from railroads, could at present stand a charge for even a storage supply of more than $20 per acre. Surveys have been made during the past season of two reservoir sites in upper Chewaucan valley. One of these, with a 100-foot dam, will store 130,000 acre-feet, and the other, with a dam of the same height, will store 95,000 acre feet. Preliminary lines were also run from a division point at the lower end of the canyon to determine the amount of land which could be covered. The withdrawal from all entry of irrigable lands under the project, together with reservoir sites and division site has been requested. Probably not 15 per cent are patented.

Concerning the Ana river project the report says:

This project lies northwest of the Chewaucan project and north of Summer lake, in south central Oregon and has an elevation of about 4,500 feet above sea level. Ana river rises in five large springs in the west half of section 6, township 30 south, range 17 east, and flows south into the north end of Summer lake, about five miles distant. The lower pool or spring is about 25 feet above the surface of the lake, and the river for a mile or more flows through a narrow canyon from 30 to 50 feet in depth, cut in a soft, whitish earth or volcanic ash. The discharge from the springs is said by people in that vicinity to be constant. A measurement made in July of this season showed 155 second-feet. With this supply it is estimated that 12,000 to 15,000 acres could be irrigated. The temperature of the water as it flows from the springs is from 65 to 68 degrees.

On the west side of Summer lake fruit and garden produce of all kinds are grown in abundance. The area that could be irrigated from Ana river should have the same climate as Summer lake, except that it would be more subject to winds. The soil in places is very alkaline and much of it is covered with sand dunes. With water at this temperature and running the entire season, it is believed that the alkali can easily be taken care of and that a sufficient amount of level land can be found to at least justify further investigation. It is believed that for this water supply the land will easily stand a charge of $20 per acre. The lands under this project are practically all unpatented. Pending further investigation the lands covering the division of the river have been withdrawn from all entry and the irrigable lands from all except homestead entry. Surveys have been made this season of the sources of Ana river, and preliminary lines run to determine the available area for irrigation. A preliminary estimate has been made, based on these surveys, for raising the water 70 feet by a dam, and diverting it over the better alkaline lands.

Speaking of the Silver Lake project the report continues:

The land for this project lies north of Silver lake, in Lake county, and is what is locally known as the Low Desert, or Silver Lake Desert. There have also been included lands west of Silver Lake. The lands of Silver Lake Desert are a little lower than Silver lake, which discharges a greater or less amount of water in different years toward Thorn lake. There is said to be a reservoir site on upper Silver creek from which lands west of Silver Creek may be irrigated. The general elevation of this region is about 4,700 feet above sea level. Practically nothing is known of the water supply available, but it is said that water can be found at a little depth below the surface over the Silver Lake Desert. A fresh water well on the border of Christmas lake indicates that here and at Thorn Lake the water table is probably near the surface, and that there is a constant flow to these lower places. Silver lake water is entirely fresh, showing that this year's discharge is not unusual at least. It is said that the wild hay lands of Pauline marsh would be materially improved if a portion of the flood waters could be diverted. Not even an approximate estimate of the area can be made until measurements of the discharge of the streams emptying into Pauline marsh have been made. The climate in this region is more severe than in the Summer lake and Chewaucan regions. Frosts occur every month in the year and snow is said to drift a great deal in the winter. It is not probable that the land so remote from railroads and with such a climate could stand a charge for water of more than $15 per acre. Practically all of the land of the Silver lake district is unpatented. Of that west of Silver lake probably half is patented. No surveys have yet been made. Gaging stations may be established on the streams flowing into Pauline marsh and at the outlet of Silver lake. The withdrawal of all entry of lands bordering on Silver lake and of all irrigable lands from all except homestead entry under the reclamation act has been requested.

In Lake county apples, prunes, cherries and all the hardier fruits can be grown. Lake county apples are noted for their preservative qualities. Sound, well-flavored apples one year old are quite common. Berries of all kinds are easily cultivated and as they ripen from four to six weeks later than the berries of Hood river and the Willamette valley they would find a ready market in Portland were there any means of getting them there. A. Y. Beach writing to the Morning Oregonian for a special edition of that paper of January 1, 1898, said of the fruit industry of Lake county:

"Early settlers in Lake county made the same mistake as has been made in nearly every fruit district on the Pacific coast. Many of the old orchards are composed of trees planted without regard to their quality. In case the fruit was poor the settler said, 'This is no fruit country.' Later a more dauntless settler came; he planted a few good trees, and with the argument of experience said, 'This is a fruit country.' Today Lake county produces peaches that for quality can be excelled nowhere. During the last year the apples of Lake county have so impressed the Californians that private parties from as far south as Sacramento have sent here for their winter's supply; this though the fruit must be hauled 150 miles in a freight wagon. White cherries that rival the famous orchard product of General John Bidwell are raised in abundance. That we have them is an accident; it simply happened that a good variety was planted. The purple cherries are a poor variety, but the few good trees that have later been planted give most satisfactory results. Plums, prunes and pears grow in such abundance that a description would jeopardize the veracity of an honest man. There is now on exhibition in the office of the Lake County Examiner a picture taken of some plum trees so laden with fruit as to give impression of fraud. But this is not all; some of Lake county's orchards are twenty years old, yet insect pests are unknown. Our orchardists could not tell a woolly aphis from a primeval man, and a sprayer would be as worthless as the proverbial fifth wheel to a wagon."

Because the rich valleys are made to produce only a fraction of what they are capable of producing, owing to their remoteness from transportation, and markets, the stock industry is the leading one, as it ever has been since the country was first settled. On the mountains is an abundance of grass and many thousands of head of stock graze there continuously during the summer season. The term "desert" as applied to a part of Lake county is misleading. The "desert" affords good pasturage for thousands of head of stock of all kinds every winter, where they rustle for themselves and do well so long as the melting snows afford them water. When this fails they work into the valleys until the pasturage gets dry or short, when they drift into the foothills or mountains as the snow recedes.

The great desert surrounding Lake county and emerging inside its borders, with its expansive acreage, is looked upon by the stranger crossing it as an awful waste of God's own gifts—fit for nothing but to dampen the ardor and make gloomy the days of the traveler. But the stockmen of Lake county will tell you that the same desert, "Nature's folly," let it be called, was made purposely by Providence for the benefit of all men in his business. It is the natural winter home of the great herds of Lake county stock. There only sufficient snow falls to furnish water for stock, while all around and about on the outside of the desert snow falls so deep that stock must be kept up and fed to save them from starving, at least two months in winter. Labor Commissioner O. P. Hoff in his report, January, 1905, said: "There is sold annually out of this county about 10,000 head of beef cattle, 60,000 head of mutton sheep, and 1,200,000 pounds of wool. In the county are pastured about 220,000 sheep, 10,000 head of horses and 50,000 head of cattle, besides a large number of mules, goats, swine, etc."

In Lake county there are many new industries in contemplation and some that have been worked only moderately will take on new life and be extended when easy transit for products is secured. There is in the county a natural salt mine that furnishes the crude product for all the local stockmen. Near the headwaters of Warner lake there are a succession of small lakes not exceeding one mile in length or breadth. These lakes go dry in the summer, and with the evaporation of the water a layer of salt is left on the ground several inches in depth. Tons and tons of this salt are gathered by the ranchers which they feed to their stock. In fact no other salt is shipped into this vast section of country except for table use. As a stock salt it is said to be of superior quality. There is very little cost in getting the salt; three men can pile up 100,000 pounds in a week; then all there is to do is to sack it, weigh it and haul it to market. This salt is delivered in Lakeview for $1.25 per hundred pounds. In an ordinary year 500,000 pounds can be taken off the marsh, and in a dry year there is much more available. This salt marsh has been known and used by the Silver Lake stockmen for more than a dozen years. In quality it is much better and purer than that usually found in salt marshes, as the little lakes are fed by salt springs. Six gallons of the water when boiled will make one gallon of fine, pure table salt.

Near Lakeview there is, also, a lime mine, inexhaustible, the quality of the product of which is said to be equal to any on the Pacific coast. The discovery of borax was an accident, and the industry at this point has never been developed. A few years ago when the lakes went dry one season, they failed to leave the salt deposit. The ranchers thought there must be a salt mine beneath, and as their stock was suffering for salt, proceeded to the place and began to dig for it. Within a few feet they struck a white substance, but it was not salt. They took it to a local blacksmith who did splendid welding with it, and they afterward learned that it was a fine grade of borax. No development has been made, however, to this date, although the borax is practically inexhaustible, and is worth from nine to six cents per pound. In the vicinities of Summer and Abert lakes are potash deposits that in time may be developed into profitable industries. Natural rock quarries abound in Lake county and there are millions of dollars' worth of fine quality of rock and gravel for building purposes and road construction within five minutes' walk of Lakeview.

Not the least valuable resource of Lake county is its timber, but, as is the case with agricultural industries, lack of transportation has retarded development of the lumber industry. The county has an area of 5,230,080 acres of which nearly 200,000 acres are covered with valuable timber—black and yellow pine, sugar pine, fir, juniper and mahogany. While there are no vast bodies of timber compared with those of the Cascade range the many small bodies and belts are distributed over the entire county and convenient for local use in the numerous valleys. This division has an advantage worthy of notice. Destructive forest fires are comparatively unknown in these small bodies as the lack of underbrush to carry the fire any great distance, and the small valleys that head off the progress, prevent the raging fires that consume so many thousands of acres of timber in more extensive forests. It will, also, be noticed that while other parts of the state have large saw mills with capacities ranging from 25,000 to 100,000 feet per day, there have been only five small mills operating in the Lake county timber, the capacity of which in no instance will exceed 10,000 feet per day in a running season of not more than six months in the year. This, in addition to the fact that most of the fencing is of wire and posts of juniper—a species of timber unfit for lumber—and most of the fuel of the same, must be seen to have preserved Lake county's supply of saw timber. There has never been a foot of lumber shipped out of this county, and unless railroads are built through here over which such transportation can be secured the limited lumber demand will keep out large mills.

The climate of Lake county is unsurpassed. Owing to its high altitude the summer months are seldom extremely hot. The actual winters are about two months long and never severe. The following incomplete figures will convey some idea of the general range of the mercury and the amount of precipitation in Warner valley and Lakeview:

Within the boundaries of Lake county there are about 1,000 miles of county roads which are maintained by a tax levy. They are not, all things considered, in a particularly good condition.

No section in the Pacific Northwest excels Lake county as a fishing and hunting ground. Brook trout as large as two pounds in weight have been taken from its mountain streams and lake trout weighing as high as eight pounds are numerous in lakes and tributary streams. Mule deer weighing 210 pounds dressed, have been killed in the glens, and the mountains and deserts are alive with them. Bands of fifty have been seen running over the hills. Antelope numbering as high as 500 in one band have been seen within thirty miles of Lakeview. Wild geese and ducks of every variety make their home here and rear their young.

In February, 1888, Mr. Henry J. Biddle contributed the following geological view of the Lake

In very remote times, but in what the geologist calls one of the later periods, this region lay below the level of the sea, and probably while it was still under water, was covered with vast sheets of melted rock and beds of broken volcanic material. These beds covered not only this region, but extended into California, Nevada and Idaho, and accumulated to a thickness of many thousand feet. Later, when a great upheaval of the region took place, the crust of the earth was broken into huge blocks. These blocks were tilted, some eastward, some westward; some had their edges thrust far above the others, or sunk down leaving great depressions. The raised or tilted blocks form the mountain ranges of today; the sunken ones the valleys. In time the winds, the rains and running streams carved ravines and canyons in the mountain flanks, shaping the peaks and gorges in all their manifold and wondrous forms, while the depressions were partly filled with the washed down mountain mass, and became broad, level plains. But in many places the sheer and stupendous cliffs still show where the crust of the earth was rent and the mountain range upheaved. These are the "fault scarps" of the geologist. The lake basins of the region are thus of two kinds; either a block has sunk, leaving a cliff on each side; or a depression has been formed on the lower edge of a tilted block, and the edge of its neighbor rises as a cliff on one side, while the surface of the tilted block forms a gradual slope on the other. Some of the larger valleys combine both of these types.

Hoping to have made clear to the reader how the lake basins were formed, I will now consider another of the prime causes of their existence, namely the climate.

Everyone knows that there is an immense region in the interior of North America in which the rainfall is very slight. In a great portion of this region so little rain falls that it is all dried up by the summer's heat, and the streams never reach the ocean. Thus we have a region of interior drainage, or, as it is generally called, the Great Basin. The lake country of Oregon lies in this dry region, and nearly all the lakes are without any outlet. Strange as it may seem some of the lakes owe their existence to the fact that the rainfall is so limited. If they received a greater supply of water the basins would fill up until the water overflowed at some point. Then the streams forming the outlets of the lakes would cut their channels deeper and deeper in the course of time, and the lake basins would be completely drained off. This has been the history of great lakes which once existed in northeastern California, and is, also, probably the reason why no large lakes are to be found in the northern half of Oregon. Thus the lake country of Oregon is the driest part of the state; and outside of this dry region, not a single large lake exists within her borders.

In what the geologists call the glacial period, when the lofty peaks of the Cascade range had huge tongues of ice stretching down from their summits, the climate was probably moister than today; or what amounts to much the same thing, the climate being colder, the rainfall was more slowly evaporated. Hence the lake basins of Oregon received larger supplies of water than now, and lakes of great size and depth existed in the valleys where we find the much smaller lakes of the present. The waves of these ancient lakes cut away the hill slopes, and, in places built up great bars of gravel. Among the most interesting features of this region are the old beach lines, which may be plainly seen stretching for miles along the mountain sides, showing us how deep the water once stood over what are now fertile plains where horses and cattle graze.

Lake county, as we have observed, received its name from its topographical character. Wholly, or partially within its borders are four large bodies of water, Goose, Warner, Abert and Summer lakes. Besides these are the considerable lakes Silver, Alkali, Christmas, Benjamin and innumerable small lakes in the mountains. Descriptions of these lakes, many of which are natural curiosities, and nearly all of which possess peculiar characteristics, may prove of interest to our readers.

In the southeastern corner of the county lies Warner valley. It is a singularly wild and picturesque region. It was named after Captain Warner, of the United States army who was killed here by the Indians while he was exploring the route of a military road to California in 1849. The valley, long and narrow, stretches nearly north and south, and has been formed by the dropping down of a gigantic block of the earth's crust. Steep precipices of black, volcanic rock rise on either side to an immense height, bare, rugged and imposing. To their summits cling a few stunted cedars; at their base sage brush grows among the huge boulders. But broad meadows cover the level floor of the valley, and marshes, with here and there a lake. The freshness of its verdure contrasts distinctly with the dark, barren mountain sides. On the maps Warner lake is shown as a long, narrow sheet of water of considerable size. In reality there is a chain of small lakes separated by marshy tracts. The water drains through sloughs during the wet season into the northernmost lake. No outlet has this latter, and its water is brackish while that of the others is fresh. This valley was entirely filled by an ancient lake, which left the mark of its water line on the mountain sides, but never rose high enough to find an outlet. As all streams have some salt in their waters, they are continually supplying salt to the lakes or ocean into which they empty. The water evaporates but the salt stays behind; hence a lake without an outlet will, in time, become salt like the ocean. This ancient lake no doubt existed long enough to accumulate a great deal of salt, and when it finally dried up, it left its salt in the mud upon the floor of the valley. So it is no wonder that there are pools or marshes in parts of this valley, filled with a strong brine. When they dry up in summer they leave crusts of salt and this is collected and sold. The elevation above sea level of Warner lake is 5,455 feet.

Goose lake is the largest in this region, but only a portion of it belongs to Oregon. It lies on the southern edge of Lake county, extending across the border into Modoc county, California. Its greatest length in a nearly north and south direction, is thirty miles, and its greatest width, east and west, is about ten miles. It covers about 190 square miles, a third of its area being within the boundaries of Oregon. The country about this lake is mountainous. The mountains about their summits are clothed with fir and pine, while lower down is a sparse growth of cedar, and the lowest slopes are overgrown with sage brush. The floor of the valley, particularly the north end, is a level sage plain, which, nearer the lake, gives place to broad meadows of natural grass, extending to the marshy border at the water's edge. The water of the lake is for the most part shallow at the edges, and only attains a depth of about twenty feet near the center.

Any one approaching Lakeview from the west can see a sharply defined line drawn horizontally on the mountain side behind the town, and several hundred feet above it. It is the water line of the ancient lake which filled this valley in a past time. It had an outlet at its southern end, and its waters found their way through the Pit river into the Sacramento. The outflowing water cut a deep channel nearby, but not quite deep enough to completely drain the valley. Goose lake usually does not overflow, but during an exceptionally wet season it rises high enough to discharge some of its waters through this ancient outlet. This occurred in 1869 and again in 1881, but not long ago its surface was very much lower and one of the pioneer trails crossed it at a point now deeply covered by water. Professor Israel C. Russell, of the University of Michigan, in his "Geological Reconnaissance in Southern Oregon, 1881-82, says that for a term of years prior to 1869, the waters of Goose lake ran much lower than at the time of writing, as was shown by the fact that a road then crossed the lake basin some four or five miles from its southern end, at a place which was in the early 80's covered by fifteen feet of water.

The water of Goose lake is slightly brackish and usually filled with the mud stirred up from its bottom. The lake well deserves its name, for in the autumn it is the resort of vast numbers of wild geese, together with ducks and all manner of other water fowl.

Abert lake lies nearly north of Goose lake, covering only some sixty square miles. But of all the lakes of Oregon it is the most interesting. The basin in which it lies has been formed by a single great crack, or fault, running nearly north and south. The block on the west side of the crack has been tilted so that its edge next to the break, is depressed, while the block on the east side has its edge thrust high in the air. The basin thus formed has a gradual slope on the west side, and stupendous precipices on the east. The strange, wild beauty of the landscape here can hardly be described in words. Viewed from the south the deep, blue-green water is seen stretching away in the distance; on the left a rugged slope of rock, scantily overgrown with sage brush, rises from the shore; on the right huge boulders, fallen from the cliffs above, lie in confused masses on the water's edge; above these tower the mighty cliffs, rising fully one thousand feet above the lake, black, silent and majestic. Far into the distance stretch these awful heights, their colors mellowing and contours softening until they are lost in an indistinct mountain mass on the far horizon. We look in vain for a sign of life; a single sail upon the broad expanse of water; the smoke of a settler's cabin on the shore; all is silent and desolate; nature is alone in her grandeur.

This lake is without any outlet and its waters are as salt as those of the ocean. They contain not only common salt, but carbonate of soda and glauber salt as well, and impart a strange, greasy feeling to the skin. No fish can live in the water, nor any living thing except little brine shrimp. Chewaucan river, its principal feeder, is filled with fish. At the mouth of this stream there is a fall where fish that have ventured or fallen over these falls are there in evidence to show that nothing can live in Abert lake. The shores of the lake at this point are composed of dead fish and fishbones. Tons of these bones could be gathered up, and at certain seasons of the year the shores are lined with fish in all stages of decomposition. When the fish first strikes the water of the lake it makes for the shore and tries to flounder out, and if it fails, hugs the shore as closely as possible, with its head out of the water until it dies. The geese and ducks and other water fowls that abound in this section do not even light upon the lake, except at the mouths of fresh water streams. The elevation of Abert lake above sea level is 4,209 feet.

Summer lake is located near the geographical center of Lake county, dividing the distance between the north and south, east and west boundaries nearly equally. The lake itself extends over twenty miles in length, fifteen miles in width, and as seen from surrounding table land deflects a deep, green tint. This lake was named, as stated before, by General Fremont in 1843. A story contradictory to this historical fact has gained some little credence. It is to the effect that a romantic plainsman named Sohmers wandered into the country many years ago, fell in love with a native daughter, a beautiful black-eyed Pocahontas of Oregon, was jilted by her and died of a broken heart, leaving his name as a legend among the Indians, which some transformed into the appropriate name of Summer lake.

This valley is bounded by high and abrupt mountains, timber-clad on west and south; low, sloping desert hills on north and east. The valley contains probably 100,000 acres that could be converted into the best agricultural land by irrigation; of this only a few thousand acres are in actual use. The country is, practically, in its infancy; a few early settlers scattered throughout the vale have grown rich in cattle raising, but have made little or no effort toward improvement.

Ana river, one of the greatest natural curiosities in the state of Oregon, is the source of supply of this lake. The river is clear as crystal, is fifty feet wide and at places of immeasurable depth. Its tide is constant, varying little with the seasons, and it flows for the most part through a level country, bank high, and so close to the surface that one can readily partake of its refreshing water with the lips by kneeling on its banks. Its source is composed of seven immense springs, probably submarine overflows, for the volume of water flowing from the earth is so great as to render the term spring inapplicable. From these springs flows water sufficient to irrigate all the present arid lands of Summer lake valley.

Silver lake lies only a few miles northwest of Summer lake and completes the list of those in Lake county. It is of small size, being only fifteen to twenty-five square miles in area, and so shallow that one can almost wade across it. It lies in the corner of a basin which once contained a much larger lake, covering some hundreds of square miles, and stretching northward over what is known as the "desert." A remarkable feature of this lake is that, although it has no outlet, its water is perfectly fresh. As before stated lakes which do not overflow usually become salt in time. It is possible that this exception to the rule may be explained as follows: Silver lake lies somewhat higher than Summer lake, 4,300 feet, and is separated from it by a rocky ridge a few miles wide. Now, it is possible that the water finds its way underground beneath this ridge, and reappears in the large springs mentioned at the north end of Summer lake. Thus the water in the lake being continually renewed would remain fresh. But it must be understood that this is merely a theory, and there is nothing to absolutely prove it. Professor E. B. Cope says that a comparatively small elevation of the waters of Silver lake would connect the waters of that lake with those of Summer lake, eighteen miles distant, and those of Summer lake with the Chewaucan river, seven miles distant. This would convert the Chewaucan swamp into a lake, and connect Abert lake with the series.

Lake county has no large rivers within her boundaries. There are a few of fair size, however, and numerous creeks. The principal streams are the Big and Little Chewaucan and Summer rivers. These are magnificent rivers, full of fish and would furnish water to irrigate large tracts of land. Summer river bubbles up out of the ground at the north end of Summer lake valley, and rolls on to Summer lake. The waters of this river stand the year round at a temperature of 68 degrees, and are clear and limpid. In the big basin where the water boils up, in places forty feet deep, one can see a silver coin at the bottom.

The Chewaucan river is another fine stream heading in the great snow belt near the Gahart mountains. The river is an old one, and in the subsidence of the waters of the old tertiary sea, when land first appeared on hills, extended up the river to the falls, or near them, a distance above the site on which Paisley now stands. It has a winding course from the mountains and flows east for about sixty miles and empties into the south end of Lake Abert. Chewaucan is an Indian name, a translation of which is said to be "Big patch of small potatoes, or camas."

Ana river, at the head of Summer lake, is an interesting study to the stranger. Only five or six miles from the head of this beautiful lake Ana river springs out of the ground like a torrent, and flows down through the sage brush to supply the lake. Winter and summer the water boils forth from a hollow basin more than an acre in width and breadth, and flows away making a current large enough to float an ordinary river boat. The water has a lukewarm temperature, winter and summer, and is pronounced artesian water by all who see and taste it. There are many theories about Ana river. It is claimed that it flows under a mountain and is fed by Silver lake, on the opposite side of the mountain, many miles away. Silver lake is of a much higher altitude, and although it does not have a feeder its depth is about the same the year round.

Lake county contains within its borders some of the most remarkable formations and natural curiosities found anywhere in the world. We shall attempt to describe a few of these that have come under our observation.

The northern part of the county embraces a large territory lying in what is known as the "desert," and within this territory are found wonders that will afford food for thought for the scientist for years to come. When they are known to the outside world they will draw a horde of tourists and students of science to them annually. The field is a virgin one as yet, only having been visited by the stockmen who have interests in the vicinity, and an occasional traveler who is hurrying from one business point to another.

The fossil fields, the moving lake, the modern Dead Sea and the salt and borax deposits, the hot springs and natural artesian wells are, possibly, among the best of the wonders within this territory, but they are so prominent and many of them cover such a large section of the country they could not remain hidden from the most casual observer, and their remarkable appearance could not fail to attract the attention of the most disinterested student in the formations of nature.

Few people realize the beauty and grandeur of the rim-rocks of Eastern Oregon, and Lake county has her share of these. In fact many people do not know what they look like, and some do not know what the word signifies. In the "desert" country these rimrocks are prominent features. The country is a succession of level plains, varying in width and length from a few miles to more than a hundred. These plains are often spoken of as plateaus from their high elevation above sea level; in fact they are nothing more or less than a succession of basins, in many cases resembling crater beds, for they lie among the mountain tops, only lower than the snow-capped peaks that have to be ascended from almost every point to reach them, and the tall rim-rocks that tower immediately above them. These plateaus or basins are separated by the rim-rocks and along one side or the other of the large lakes they tower from a few feet to hundreds of feet in the air. The walls of these rocks are perfectly perpendicular, often possessing the appearance of having been constructed by skilled human hands. Layer upon layer of smooth rocks lie upon one another, with the joints broken as carefully as modern masonry work, with pillars now and then, many feet tall, to support them on larger tables or rock. These pillars, however, are close together and although possessing various sides, from a triangle to an octagon, they fit perfectly together. At the top of these walls lie broad, level rocks, jutting out to several feet above the sides of the wall, like the leaf of a table or the rim of a hat. It is impossible to descend from the top of this rim down the wall, or to ascend from below to the top of the rim-rock, except where the wall is broken by crevices, gulches or canyons.

A two days' drive from Silver Lake (in the northern part of the county), the entrance way to the main "desert," brings one to the greatest wonder on the Pacific coast, possibly the greatest in the United States. Here is a vast fossil field covering hundreds of acres, in the midst of which is the wonderful "moving" lake. One does not see it move, in fact, but the evidence is there to show that it moves, and there are men living in Lake county who can verify the fact that it is constantly on the move. Not only the water moves, but the lake changes its bed from time to time, and in the course of a few decades traverses considerable territory.

In this region there are many sand beds. The sand is of the finest grain and of unknown depth. It is always dry, as it seems to never rain to amount to anything at this point, and what little rainfall there is in this section does not even dampen the sand, much less moisten the earth. At this place the wind blows a gale most of the time, and carries with it clouds of the sand. In a few days' time the wind shifts the sand until a point that was high last week is a deep hole, or pit, this week. Then the wind changes and blows from another direction for a few days, and this shifts the surface of the earth at this point again. The lake which lies in these sands is necessarily compelled to change its bed continually. As the wind sweeps out a hole on the north side the water must follow; then it changes to the west so that one can see where it has traveled about the desert for years, never getting far from home, it is true, but still it travels considerable distances for a lake. It is a mystery to all who visit this section why the lake never dries up in such a place. There seem to be no springs and there is no stream to feed it; the rainfall is light, and being constantly on the move one would naturally think that it would be absorbed by the dry sands. But within the knowledge of the first settlers of the country this lake has never been dry, and has neither grown larger or smaller.

But the greatest object of interest to the scientist in this section are the fossil beds. The entire sand-covered section is a fossil field. Animals for ages have come to this lake (Fossil, or Moving lake) for water, and as the aged and sick ones have died they have been covered by the dry sands and their bodies preserved in such a state so long that they have become completely fossilized. And as they have followed the lake in its travels the consequence is that the field is a large one. The inexperienced who pick up the petrified bones of these animals find many the species of which are unknown to them. It is said that species have been found here that puzzled and interested the few scientists who saw them. They have been carried away by the occasional visitors and adorn many of the yards of distant ranches. But the field is still full of them, and the scientist may find work here for years to come.

Fort Rock, one of the most peculiar rock formations to be found in the west, is situated just sixteen miles north of Silver lake. It is so named because it is a natural rock-walled fort, enclosing about thirty-five acres of land, with a rock wall averaging 300 feet high. The fort is circular in form and rises from a level plain many miles from the surrounding mountains. The wall is about 200 feet thick at the base and thirty-five feet wide at the top. Outside it rises perpendicularly, but there are several places on the inside where by exercising care and caution one may scale it. Such a feat is impossible from the outside. At the south side of the fort there is an opening less than one-eighth of a mile wide, which makes it easy of access.

There is no particular legend or tradition among the Indians regarding Fort Rock. They say it has always existed so far as they know. It was never used as a fort or place of refuge during tribal wars. The name Fort Rock was given to the formation by the early settlers owing to its resemblance to a fort. During the warm, sultry days of summer cattle and horses in the neighborhood seek the sheltering shade of the high rock wall. The only use ever made of Fort Rock was occasionally as a round-up corral by cattle and horsemen. During the years to come thousands of people will visit this curiosity from all parts of the country, and possibly in the future Silver lake will be one of the noted places on some trunk line railroad, where tourists will be advised to stop and see the sights. Recently the land where this natural curiosity is located, which during all these years has been government land, was filed upon.

Lake county, like most of the counties of Southern Oregon, has a number of hot springs where boiling hot water rushes from the earth. A number of these springs lie just outside the town of Lakeview. Most of these have been taken up by settlers on their homesteads, but they are lying idle awaiting the time when it may pay to improve them. In passing through the country on a cold day the steam arising from these springs conveys the idea, from a distance, that a great fire is raging at that particular place. All vegetation is killed near the springs, but as the water flows away in the distance and the temperature is reduced, a heavy growth of grass is produced, and winter and summer stock come to these places to graze.

Another peculiar formation in Lake county are the "pot-holes," so called, situate in South Warner basin. They appear to be large, inverted, cone-shaped rock formations, the chasms between the scarps of the rocks being filled with water, around the extreme outer edge of which grow dense clusters of vigorous tules from fifteen to twenty feet high. These pot-holes are always dangerous to man or beast; both alike dread them; for once in them the chances of escape from drowning seem to be few and far between.

In concluding this chapter we desire to express the opinion that Lake county will, in future years, become one of the richest in Southern Oregon. When conditions make possible the development of its resources, then the county will contain a population many times as great as at present. It is now among the richest, if not the richest, according to population, of any county in Oregon.

CHAPTER VI

POLITICAL.

Next to Wasco, Lake county is the oldest in the series of counties herein treated, and next to the "Mother of Counties" of eastern Oregon, Lake county's political history dates back farther than any of the others. The first election held within the boundaries of the present Lake county was in June, 1870, four years prior to the formation of the county. This territory was then a part of Jackson county, and for the election the county court of that county granted an election precinct for the settlers of Goose lake valley. The voting place was at A. Tenbrook's ranch, about five miles south of the present site of Lakeview. An active interest was taken in the election and about twenty-five or thirty votes were cast, more, in fact, than there were settlers in the precinct. Many of the votes cast were by soldiers who came over from Camp Warner, and who were not legally entitled to vote. Thereafter until the county was created in 1875 the settlers voted, the Lake country being a precinct of Jackson county.

During all of its early history Lake county was strongly Democratic. At all of the presidential elections a safe majority was given the Democratic electors; the Democratic state and district tickets nearly always carried the county, and it was only occasionally that a Republican was found serving the county in an official capacity. Each election would find both parties in the field with the Democrats carrying off the plums. These conditions prevailed until the nineties, when the Peoples party appeared in the field. That party gained considerable strength and carried the county in 1892 for its candidate for president. It also occasionally elected a county officer during the nineties. The Republican party during these years became stronger and began to contest the claims of the Democrats of being the dominant party in Lake county.

During the later years the county has been quite evenly divided on the local ticket, both the Republican and Democratic parties electing a part of their ticket. William McKinley, in 1900, and Theodore Roosevelt, in 1904, carried the county by overwhelming majorities, the first time in history that the county cast its vote for Republican presidential candidates.

Complete data for the political history of Lake county is not available, but we have, by a careful gleaning of all records known to be in existence, compiled as nearly complete an account of the different elections as is possible.

Lake county came into existence on February 1, 1875, by authority of an act passed by the legislature and approved by Governor L. F. Grover on October 24, 1874. The enabling act provided that the governor should appoint the first county officers of the new county, and this Governor Grover did on January 22, 1875. A Democratic administration being in power at the time, most of the first officers of Lake county were Democrats. Their term of office was from February 1, 1875, until their successors, elected in June, 1876, qualified. They were:

Eli C. Mason, Democrat, county judge; Henry Fuller, Democrat, county commissioner; A. F. Snelling, Democrat, county commissioner; William Roberts, Democrat, county clerk; Thomas Mulholland, Democrat, sheriff; George Nurse, Republican, treasurer; J. J. P. Smith, Democrat, assessor.

Besides these, William R. Jones was selected by the county court to serve as school superintendent, the governor having neglected to name an incumbent for the office. County offices in these early days of Lake county's history were not sought so eagerly as is the more recent custom, and there were many resignations before the first term expired and other officials were named to fill the unexpired terms. J. J. P. Smith resigned the office of assessor and George C. Duncan was appointed in June, 1875. Henry Fuller resigned as commissioner and J. P. Roberts was named for that office August 23, 1875. On the same date Nelson Stephenson was appointed clerk, vice William Roberts, resigned. In October, 1875, Quincy A. Brooks was chosen school superintendent, taking the place of William R. Jones. These men named served as the county's first officers and their terms of office expired in July, 1876.

The first justices of the peace were appointed by the county court and were as follows: Che-waucan precinct, Stephen Moss, appointed February, 1875; Crooked Creek, O. L. Stanley, February, 1875; Summer Lake, Dr. Colwell, February, 1875; Silver Lake, A. V. Lane, February, 1875; Linkville, Nelson Stephenson, February, 1875; Crooked Creek, George Freeman, June, 1875; Linkville, J. W. Hamaker, October, 1875; Eagle Point, O. P. Russell, October, 1875. For Eagle Point precinct M. T. Walters was appointed constable in June, 1875.

Although the first general election was not held until in June, 1876, there was a special election held on October 25, 1875, to elect a member of congress. At this initial election held in Lake county there were 210 votes cast. The official vote was: Lafayette Lane, dem., 143; Henry Warren, rep., 65; J. W. Dimmick, 1; Whitney, 1.

The county was divided, at the first term of the county court, February 1, 1875, into nine election precincts, and at the meeting of the county court on June 7, the first election judges were named. The precincts and first election officers who served at the special election of October 25, 1875, were:

No. 1—Linkville precinct, place of voting at the town of Linkville. Judges, O. T. Brown, N. Stephenson, Stephen Stukle.

No. 2—Lost River precinct, polling place at the house of John Shook. Judges, John Fulker-son, John Shook, J. H. Colahan.

No. 3—Sprague River precinct, polling place at the house of John Smith. Judges, J. A. Smith, William Ferrell, W. M. Prine, Sr.

No. 4—Goose Lake precinct, polling place at the house of John Broback. Judges, A. R. Jones, James Barnes, Thomas Lofton.

No. 5—Eagle Point precinct, polling place at the house of L. Lowry. Judges, M. T. Walters, A. Tenbrook, James Fitzgerald.

No. 6—Crooked Creek precinct, polling place at the house of Loveless. Judges, Robert Redding, Thomas Patton, George Freeman.

No. 7—Chewaucan precinct, polling place, "at the house now occupied by Henry Fuller." Judges, Stephen Moss, George Elliott, T. J. Brattain.

No. 8—Summer Lake precinct, polling place, "at the house now occupied by James Foster." Judges, J. B. Blair, A. C. Marks, James Foster, Sr.

No. 9—Silver Lake precinct, polling place, "at the house now occupied by Lane & Chase." Judges, Horace Lane, E. H. Noble, J. L. P. Smith.

Of these nine precincts the three first named were in that part of the county later formed into Klamath county; the others were all in the present Lake county.

Linkville—J. L. Hanks, John Shalloch and William Hicks, judges; F. M. Smith and John A. Miller, clerks. Lost River—N. S. Goodlow, J. H. Campbell and S. N. Hazen, judges; O. C. Applegate and A. H. Griffin, clerks. Sprague River—Enoch Loper, J. A. Smith and William Prine, judges; B. B. Demming and Robert Scott, clerks. Goose Lake—William Denny, Chas. Broback and Thomas Lofton, judges; S. Campbell and J. J. Charlton, clerks. Eagle Point—M. D. Hopkins, G. C. Clark and D. H. Hartzog, judges; M. T. Walters and A. B. Contner, clerks. Crooked Creek—Chas. A. Rice, Jas. McAfee and William Patton, judges; J. C. Shellhammer and W. H. Patton, clerks. Chewaucan—T. J. Brattain, J. C. Elder and John Alexander, judges; S. P. Moss and J. M. Small, clerks. Silver Lake—G. C. Duncan, F. J. Murdock and A. V. Lane, judges; J. O. Bunyard and P. G. Chrisman, clerks.

At this first general election there were cast 389 votes, a gain of 179 over the vote at the special election of the preceding October. Nearly the full vote of the county was cast, due largely to the interest taken in the permanent location of the county seat. The number of votes cast by the several precincts of the county was as follows: Eagle Point, 79; Goose Lake, 23; Chewaucan, 23; Summer Lake, 42; Silver Lake, 23; Crooked Creek, 24; Sprague River, 17; Linkville, 103; Bonanza, 53.

Owing to the county seat contest the election was an exciting one and the excitement continued for some time after the ballots were counted. The canvass of the returns was made by County Clerk N. Stephenson, John P. Shook, justice of the peace for Lost River precinct, and J. W. Hamaker, justice of the peace for Linkville precinct. The action of the board of canvassers was not unanimous. The canvas was signed by the two first named, while Justice Hamaker protested. His protest, annexed to the abstract as signed by the other members of the board, was as follows:

I hereby protest the correctness of the above abstract, there being no precinct in Lake county, Oregon, known as Hamaker precinct.

J. W. HAMAKER,
J. P., Linkville Precinct.

Mr. Stephenson annexed the following explanation to the findings of the board:

Justice Hamaker protests receiving and counting "Bonanza," which was endorsed on the back of the "poll books" as returned to this office by the clerks and judges of election. The polls were held on the day of election at "Bonanza" school house in said precinct of Lost River—hence the protest of Justice Hamaker.

The vote of Bonanza was allowed to stand. Had it been thrown out there would have been only one change in the result of the election; S. C. Hudson would have been elected sheriff instead of T. J. Brattain.

The result of the vote as declared by the county clerk and Justice Shook was:

For District Attorney, First Judicial District—H. K. Hanna, dem., 230; C. B. Watson, rep., 142.

For State Senator—S. G. Thompson, dem., 213; E. Barnes, rep., 129.

For Representative—D. W. Cheeseman, dem., 202; O. C. Applegate, rep., 174.

For County Commissioners—S. P. Moss, dem., 231; W. H. Horton, rep., 170; A. Tenbrook, dem., 222; O. T. Brown, rep., 139.

The latter also resigned after serving less than a year and Andrew McCallen, Democrat, was appointed June 7, 1877.

The first presidential election in which Lake county participated was held November 7, 1876, and showed the county to be in the Democratic column by nearly 100 majority. There were 438 votes cast, a gain of 49 over the June election. The official vote was:

These officers served their full term with the exception of the school superintendent. E. O. Steele died while holding that office and on December 4, 1878, P. B. Vernon, Democrat, was appointed to fill the vacancy.

At the next general election, that of June 7, 1880, over 700 votes were cast, a gain of over 200 in two years. The official vote on the congressional and district tickets was as follows:

For Congressman—John Whiteaker, dem., 417; M. C. George, rep., 286.

For Judge First Judicial District—A. P. Hammond, rep., 294; T. B. Kent, dem., 407.

The Democrats succeeded in electing nearly all their candidates on the county ticket, although a few Republicans were chosen, among them O. A. Stearns for representative. Unfortunately the official vote of the county election cannot be obtained. Those elected were: O. A. Stearns, rep., representative; George Durand, dem., county commissioner; George W. Penland, rep., county commissioner; J. L. Hanks, dem., sheriff; F. M. Cheesman, dem., clerk; A. McCallen, dem., treasurer; J. S. Watts, county judge; William Tullock, dem., assessor; J. H. Clayton, rep., school superintendent; T. W. Colvin, dem., surveyor; William Harvey, coroner. With one exception these officers served the full two year term. Geo. Durand resigned the office of county commissioner and U. F. Abshier, Democrat, was appointed in August, 1881.

The next general election, that of June 5, 1882, showed a falling off in the vote, there being a trifle less than 600 votes cast. The Democrats elected every candidate on the county ticket and carried the county by over 100 majority for all the state, congressional and district tickets. Following is the official vote:

In 1882 Klamath county was cut off from the mother county and Lake was reduced by about one-half. We find at the next election, June 2, 1884, that the county under the new conditions was still strongly Democratic, that party electing every county officer. The vote of this election cannot be obtained. The county officers elected were: A. Fitts, dem., county judge; W. D. Arnett, dem., county commissioner; T. O. Blair, dem., county commissioner; A. F. Snelling, dem., clerk; A. McCallen, dem., treasurer; O. L. Stanley, dem., assessor; W. J. Moore, dem., school superintendent; A. W. Charlton, dem., sheriff.

Again in 1886 the Democrats swept the county, electing the whole county ticket with the exception of clerk. Nearly 500 votes were cast. The official vote of this election, which was held on June 7, was:

For Governor—T. R. Cornelius, rep., 185; Sylvester Pennoyer, dem., 289; J. E. Houston, pro., 17.

The office of county judge became vacant in 1887 by the death of A. Fitts, and on February 10, Charles A. Cogswell, Democrat, was appointed by Governor Sylvester Pennoyer to fill the unexpired term.

A special election was held on November 8, 1887, to vote on several proposed constitutional amendments. One of these was the prohibition question. The result in Lake county was: For the amendment, 160; against, 204.

Lake county polled 282 more votes at the June election of 1888 than two years before. The Republicans were successful in electing four candidates on the county ticket, which was the best record they had made in the history of Lake county politics. The officers elected at this election were: W. A. Wilshire, dem., county judge; J. E. McDonough, dem., assessor; L. Taylor, rep., surveyor; R. L. Sherlock, rep., commissioner; Wm. A. Bagley, dem., commissioner; Wm. Carll, rep., sheriff; Wm. T. Boyd, rep., clerk; J. W. Howard, dem., coroner; A. McCallen, dem., treasurer; W. J. Moore, dem., school superintendent.

At the presidential election this year the heretofore big Democratic majorities were cut down, and Grover Cleveland received a majority of only thirteen over Benjamin Harrison for president.

At the general election of June 2, 1890, over 800 votes were cast. The Democrats regained the offices they had lost at the election two years before and again made a clean sweep. The Republicans carried the county for their candidate for joint representative. The official vote:

For Governor—D. P. Thompson, rep., 330; S. Pennoyer, dem., 484.

For Coroner—J. W. Howard, dem., 783.

There was a falling off in the vote at the general election of 1892, only a little over 700 votes being cast. This election was the first one at which the people of Lake county had a chance to vote for candidates of the Peoples party, there being candidates of the new party on the congressional and district tickets. The vote they received in Lake county ranged from 70 to 182. The Republicans gave Binger Hermann for congress a plurality of twelve over the Democratic candidate. The contest on the county ticket was close in several cases, the Republicans electing one officer, John McElhurney, for commissioner by a plurality of five votes. The official vote:

For Congressman—Binger Hermann, rep., 301; Winfield T. Rigdon, pro., 6; M. V. Rork, peo., 111; R. M. Veatch, dem., 289.

Although a poor showing was made by the Peoples party at the June election, that party carried the county at the presidential election on November 8, the electors favorable to General Weaver for president receiving 300 votes. The Harrison electors received 237 votes and the Cleveland electors 110. The county gave the prohibition electors one vote.

The election of June 4, 1894, was a close one. The Peoples party had gained in strength until it now ranked up close to the old parties. All three parties had county tickets in the field and the contests were all close. Nearly 800 votes were cast. The Republicans carried the county for their candidates for congressman, governor and district attorney, while the Democrats succeeded in carrying the county for their candidate for joint representative. On the county ticket the Republicans elected five officers, the Democrats three and the Peoples party one. This year marked the change in the condition of Lake county politics from solid Democratic to close and doubtful. The official vote was:

The election of June 1, 1896, showed a slight gain in votes cast, there being over 800. Again the three parties had tickets in the field and again the contest was close. The Republicans carried the county for their candidates for congressman, district attorney and joint representative, the Democrats for joint senator. Six Republican candidates on the county ticket were elected and two Democrats. The official vote:

The Republicans had shown the greatest strength at the June election, but in the presidential election, November 3, the Democrats and Peoples party, united on William Jennings Bryan for president, carried the county over William McKinley. The vote of this election was as follows:

A slightly smaller vote was cast at the election June 6, 1898, than was two years before. The Republicans had by this time become very strong and were acknowledged to be the dominant party in Lake county politics. They carried the county for all their candidates on the state, congressional, judicial and legislative tickets and lected all but four candidates on the county ticket. A fusion of some of the county officers was accomplished between the Democrats and Peoples party, the first and only time in the county's history fusion was tried. The official vote follows:

EDUCATIONAL.

Lake county is in no whit behind the other counties of Oregon in matters educational, in fact, she holds an enviable position in the state and in many points excels her sister counties. As to the average wages paid teachers, there is but one county in the state that pays higher than does Lake. Possessed of a population wide awake to the necessities of educational facilities for the rising generations, and with the determination to provide for her sons and daughters, in this important point, steady progress has been made in the county from the date of the first school held in a ground floor shanty until today many commodious school houses dot the hillsides in charge of a corps of teachers up to date and capable. The people have kept pace with the demands in furnishing facilities for proper schools and as fast as new districts were needed they have been organized and suitable buildings erected so that all communities might have the benefits of instruction as needed. It is well known that the school system of any community or section reflects the intelligence of the residents and applying this test, Lake county need have no fear of falling behind the other counties of the great state of Oregon.

Inasmuch as much relative to the schools of the county has been stated in different portions of the chapters where the thread of history has called for such expression, it simply remains for us in this brief chapter to give such statistics as are available and will be useful for reference, as a detailed account of each school is not called for and would be burdensome to the reader. There has always been and is today that healthful and friendly rivalry between districts in Lake county that is productive of so much effort to make a good showing for the home place and each community has many things to show that are very commendable. It would be our pleasure to make extended mention of the many incidents of school life throughout the county and enter into the spirit of the district scholar's work, both routine and extra, as the pleasant matches and various meetings public and regular that are held from time to time, and chronicle much that would be interesting to the younger minds, especially, but the facts are that we have been utterly unable to find data for such a chapter. While there has been no lack of zest and inspiration among the scholars and teachers of the county, there has been an almost total lack of preserving minutes or accounts that would assist us in making such a chapter. Therefore, it is impossible to place it here, though we much desire it. The early debates, the spelling matches, the exhibitions and many other things that combine to make school life happy and interesting have all had their place in Lake county and still do, as the spirit of emulation in kindness is fostered by the teachers and is a sign of healthful growth.

As to the course of study, we find substantially the same as in all well regulated schools of the land, while the thoroughness of instruction constantly maintained brings the privilege of the Lake county boys and girls to gain a good education well up to the best to be found.

Thus far in her history Lake county has not voted the high school allowed by the state laws and the school in Lakeview is the only graded one in the county. Therefore all districts look to Lakeview to furnish the opportunity for the scholars to pursue the higher branches. The city has not been slow to respond and in addition to the regular grades two years of high school work have been maintained while it is intended at once to add another year. This will provide for the students who are inclined to seek the benefits of extended study, the privilege of enjoying the same in their home county. A splendid corps of teachers are employed in Lakeview and the large brick school house is filled each year with earnest seekers for the knowledge that is power. In addition to the regular residents of Lakeview, there are many pupils from the country districts in attendance on the city schools and the high school course being extended is thus beneficial to all parts of the county. Owing to this, Lakeview schools are prosperous and excellent as every endeavor has been made to provide the best for the students in the way of instruction. When Lakeview was swept by the demon of flames fate decreed that the school building should remain and this was an untold benefit to the youth as the school was enabled to continue its way without interruption.

No school was held in the boundaries of what is now Lake county prior to 1873, although there were many settlers. Among those settlers were few families and therefore the need for schools had not been felt. But in the year mentioned there were a number of families in Goose Lake valley and it was apparent that a school was needed. The law in Oregon is that a three months' term of school shall be held in a section desiring to be organized into a district before the organization can be consummated. Therefore the first step was to secure a teacher and commence actual instruction of the young. As no person in the valley held a school certificate it was decided that Miss Nannie Fitzgerald should apply to the county superintendent of Jackson county, for Lake was then embraced in Jackson county, for a permit to teach the required three months in Goose Lake valley. Miss Fitzgerald, now Mrs. John O'Neil, secured the permit asked for from the superintendent at Jacksonville and in due time was installed as teacher of the school in Goose Lake valley. A little shanty about twelve feet square with no floor except the ground was set aside for the school house, it being on A. Tenbrook's ranch, and there gathered the fifteen children to be found in the settlement. Many of these children had never attended school before and there was a great scarcity of suitable books. But who can stop the spirit born in the atmosphere of the west! Ground floor, rough shack, lack of books, with nothing but the most primitive conveniences, or, rather, necessities, for the word "conveniences" is strangely out of place in this description, could not do it. The new teacher and the new scholars adapted themselves to the situation with a spirit of determination to make the best of it and soon they were in the harness in real earnest and the hum of the little school was as real and pleasant as that in many a more favored region of wealthy communities. They studied and taught and labored on together with the real inspiration of the muse of learning and various ones can point back to many pleasant days even in the floorless shack a third of a century ago. Thus started the first school in what is now Lake county. Upon the completion of the required three months the district was organized and so was set in motion the regular machinery of education.

The next year, 1874, Miss Fitzgerald taught a term of school on Kelly creek, which was the second school of Lake county. The school was held in a little log cabin and the enrollment was about twenty.

In 1875, the year Lake county was organized, the enrollment of school children in the entire county was 248, while the attendance was much less. It must be remembered that while we have been detailing the starting of the first and second schools in what is now Lake county, there were other schools started before this in what was then set off as Lake county in 1875, which accounts for the seemingly large number of school children in this year. But the county of Lake, as originally set off, embraced what is now Klamath county.

It is very unfortunate that there is not available, so far as the writer is able to ascertain, the detailed reports of the various school superintendents of these early days. Beside bare statistics, only what can be gained from personal interviews can be found now, and it is a matter of common understanding that it is very hard for the human memory to recall such things as school history which now would be so interesting, back for a period of thirty years. Some can recall items, here and there, and then others may bring up memories of some other things, but few can make accurately any statements as to the actual conditions. Therefore, we can do nothing otherwise than to pass these things.

William J. Moore, superintendent of schools for Lake county for the year ending June 30, 1886, reports at that time fourteen organized districts in the county, 274 pupils enrolled with an average daily attendance of 211, while seventeen teachers were employed. There were eight school houses and the total value of the school property amounted to $3,010.00. This allows a comparison to ascertain the growth from 1873, with the start of the ground floored shack with fifteen pupils, to 1886. The figures present a showing of good growth and a mindful interest in things educational.

The next three years show an equally increased growth as the enrollment was 490, daily attendance 330, while the total number of school children was 788. Concerning this A. H. Fischer remarks in his annual report, "This is much better than the older counties are doing in the thickest portions of the state." In this year we learn that the county had sixteen organized districts, fifteen school houses and the total value of school property was $9,928.00.

In 1892 we note that there were in the county nineteen organized districts, seventeen school houses and twenty-three teachers employed. The number of enrolled pupils was 512 while the average daily attendance was 453. The value of school property had increased to $25,629.00.

From the statistics prepared by the state superintendent of public instruction, we reproduce the following table showing the number of children between four and twenty years of age in the county, number of pupils enrolled and the average daily attendance, for the years from the organization of the county until 1902.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES

LAKE COUNTY

JOSEPH L. MORROW. The subject of this sketch is a prominent farmer and stock raiser residing in South Warner valley, two miles south from Adel postoffice. No resident of Warner valley stands higher in the estimation of his fellow settlers than does Mr. Morrow, chiefly on account of the leading part he has taken on behalf of the people of Warner valley against the Warner Valley Stock Company in the far-famed land contest that has occupied the attention of the citizens of the valley for the past nineteen years. The case was brought about and is kept in progress through the effort of the aforementioned stock company to procure the lands of the valley under the Swamp Land act, and have it set aside for use only as grazing land. In reality the land, in order to be made productive, requires irrigation, and in consequence the settlers have constructed the Deep creek and Twenty-Mile creek irrigation ditches with which they irrigate their farms. Notwithstanding this fact, the efforts on the part of the Warner Valley Stock Company have been persistent to deprive the settlers of their land, and the fight has been one of the bitterest in the history of the state. Mr. Morrow has from the first been the champion of the settlers' cause, and in their interest he has made three trips to Washington, D. C., and six to the Oregon state capital, for all of which strenuous effort his fellow citizens give him due honor and credit.

Joseph L. Morrow is a native of Chariton county, Missouri, born July 2, 1834, but was reared in Macon county, Missouri. His father was the Rev. Jesse S. Morrow, a Baptist minister and a farmer born in Kentucky, and an early pioneer of Missouri. He died on March 2, 1855, in Macon county, Missouri. Mr. Morrow's mother was Henrietta (Williams) Morrow, also a native of Kentucky, who died in Platte county, Missouri, in 1838. Mr. Morrow has one brother, John S. Morrow, a resident of Macon county, Missouri; and one sister, Esther A. Morrow, of Texas. One brother and two sisters, William W. Morrow, Mrs. Rebecca Summers and Mrs. Elizabeth Green, are deceased.

Although he never enjoyed the opportunity of attending school, Mr. Morrow acquired a good common school education by home study, both in the state of his birth and after coming west. In the spring of 1854 he started west with Tom Goram's train of ox teams, he having hired to Mr. Goram at twenty dollars per month as driver of three yoke of oxen. The train started on April 12 and arrived at Nevada City, California, August 19, 1854, our subject having walked the major part of the distance. While en route the train was annoyed to some extent by the hostile tribes, and in one fight Mr. Morrow was shot in the leg with an arrow, though not critically wounded. After arriving at Nevada City he engaged in working in the mines, later going to the Forest City mines, where he mined until 1858, when he went to Sonoma county, California. He was there married, July 2, 1858, to Sibbrina Ahart, a native of Roane county, Tennessee, born June 21, 1835. Mrs. Morrow's parents both died during her childhood, and she crossed the plains with a brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. James Cook, and two brothers, James Ahart, of Amador county, California, and Spencer Ahart, of Sonoma county, California. She has another sister Mrs. Hanna Puckett, of Douglas county, Oregon.

Following their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Morrow removed to Big River Mills, where Mr. Morrow was engaged in the sawmill business until the autumn of 1859, when they returned to Nevada county. Here our subject again engaged in mining until the fall of 1865, when he emigrated to Douglas county, Oregon, and entered the business of farming and mining on Myrtle creek. In 1881 he removed to Fort Bidwell, California, and there made his home for four years. In the year 1881, while on a horse-hunting expedition, Mr. Morrow passed through the Warner valley, and was so favorably impressed with the country that in 1885 he brought his family to reside here, settling on the ranch where they now live. He has taken an active interest in the welfare and development of the country from the day of his arrival and has always been one of the most nearly indispensable citizens of the valley.

Mr. Morrow now owns three hundred and twenty acres of good hay land but represents six hundred and forty acres, one quarter-section of which belonged to a son, now deceased, and the remaining one hundred and sixty acres being the property of a minor grandson. He has some stock, but having leased his land, Mr. Morrow is now living a life of semi-retirement.

To Mr. and Mrs. Morrow have been born six children, named as follows: John W., born in Mendocino county, California, April 21, 1859, and died July 25, 1889; Joseph A., born in Nevada county, California, April 2, 1861; Nancy J. Bennett and Jesse B. Morrow, twins, born in Sacramento county, California, May 16, 1863; Mrs. Sarah E. Neisham, born January 24, 1869, in Douglas county, Oregon, and died in Chico, California, August 5, 1892; and Mrs. Mary E. Cooper, born July 21, 1872, in Douglas county, Oregon.

AHAZ WASHINGTON BRYAN resides some twenty-three miles north of Lakeview at what is known as the Bryan stage station. He is a stage contractor and has been in the business for many years in Lake county. He was born on December 16, 1858, in Mercer county, Missouri, the son of Daniel Boone and Mary (Fairley) Bryan. The father was born in Tennessee, in 1828 and served in the state militia in Missouri during the Civil War. The mother is a native of Ohio. They now live in this county. The other children of the family besides our subject are Mrs. Ella Strohm of Yamhill county, Oregon; David M., of this county; Mrs. Lucy J. Reed of this county; and Mary H. The family crossed the plains with ox teams in 1864, making settlement in Yamhill county, where our subject was reared on the farm and received his education. When still young, he took a trip to western Oregon, then returned to Yamhill county and in 1887 journeyed to Lake county. He worked for wages for several years then began sub-contracting on the mail routes. Finally, in 1902, he secured the contract of the mail from Lakeview to Paisley and he has been handling the business ever since. In 1902, he purchased his present home, an estate of five hundred acres, one-third of which is first class hay land. He has a good house, large barn, blacksmith shop and various other improvements. He does his own horse shoeing and blacksmith work. Mr. and Mrs. Bryan keep a stage station for the accommodation of the traveling public and are doing a good business in that line. He also raises cattle and horses.

Fraternally, he is a member of the A. O. U. W. and the W. W. On July 24, 1892, Mr. Bryan married Nancy J. Moss, who was born in Modoc county, California, the daughter of Stephen P. and Susan (Casteel) Moss. To this union three children have been born, Bessie E., Tressie H. and Annie L.

WILLIAM ANDREW CURRIER, who is engaged in stock raising, resides fourteen miles northwest from Paisley, his postoffice. He was born at Corvallis, Benton county, Oregon, on October 12, 1851. His father, J. M. Currier, was born in Irasburg, Vermont, February 12, 1827. He went with his parents to New York state in 1842, thence journeyed to Missouri in 1844 and two years later, crossed the plains with his brother-in-law, A. L. Humphrey, and two sisters, and settled on a donation claim near Corvallis where he still resides. He took part in the Cayuse Indian War. In August, 1850, he married Maria Foster, who was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, April 11, 1834. Her father, Andrew Foster, fought in the War of 1812. She had crossed the plains in 1845 with her parents. To Mr. and Mrs. Currier, four children were born, of whom our subject, Mrs. J. W. Belknap of Hanford, California, and M. C. Currier, of Paisley, are still living. It is of interest to note in this connection, that Mr. Humphrey was a member of the first Oregon Legislature.

William A. Currier came to Lake county in 1875 and settled at Summer Lake where he still lives. He had married on January 19, 1875, Miss Kitty E. Hadley and to this union three children have been born, Eva, Ada and William Manley. Mr. Currier is in Lake county a most prominent and respected citizen and has the confidence and esteem of all who know him. He has been instrumental with others in making the county what it is today and has been very faithful in his labors. Since Mr. Currier has been elected commissioner of the county, it has prospered beyond expectation and is now entirely out of debt and he deserves great credit for bringing about these desirable ends. He is a successful business man and has accumulated a snug fortune since he came to Lake county. He owns seventeen hundred acres of land, all under fence, good comfortable house and barns, and raises all kinds of fruits and vegetables. Mr. Currier also owns two thousand head of cattle and is considered one of the largest horse owners in Central Oregon, having over a thousand head of these valuable animals.

Fraternally, Mr. Currier is a member of the I. O. O. F. lodge, No. 177, of Paisley.

Mrs. Currier was born on July 7, 1862, in Siskiyou county, California. Her father, S. B. Hadley, was born May 10, 1828, and died April 20, 1891, at Paisley, Oregon. Her mother, Amelia (Shinn) Hadley, was born September 21, 1825, and died October 3, 1886, at Myrtle creek, Douglas county, Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Hadley were married on April 10, 1851, and the same year crossed the plains from Galesville, Illinois, and settled in the Umpqua valley, Oregon, in 1852. To them were born the following named children: Albert, December 20, 1852, deceased; Margret, March 9, 1854, deceased; Samuel, December 3, 1856; Melvin and Melvina, April 21, 1858; John, March 14, 1860, deceased; Kitty, July 7, 1862; and Henry, June 15 1866.

WILLIAM L. POPE is a native of Yreka, California, born September 18, 1864, and is now a cattle raiser residing five miles south from Warner Lake postoffice on Twenty-Mile creek. His ranch is known all over southern Oregon as the "20-Mile Ranch" and is a noted way station on the Fort Bidwell-Plush road.

Mr. Pope is the son of Charles W. and Medora (Combs) Pope, California pioneers. The father was born at Chillicothe, Ohio, and crossed the plains to California in 1849, settling at Yreka, where he was engaged in mining and the stock business until 1868. He then removed to Little Shasta, where he resided until his death, which occurred in May, 1889. He was sixty-eight years of age when he died. The mother was a native of West Bend, Indiana, born in 1842, and crossed the plains to Yreka, California, at the age of ten years. She died in 1880.

Our subject grew to manhood at the home of his parents, and received a good public school education. In June, 1884, he came to Lakeview and engaged in the sheep business with D. V. Cleland, Jr., under the firm style of Pope & Cleland. Three years later the firm dissolved, and Mr. Pope engaged in the business of buying and selling sheep, which business he followed until 1901, when he abandoned the sheep business and engaged in raising cattle. He now devotes himself exclusively to the raising of cattle and the management of his ranch. He purchased his present home in 1895, but has lived upon it only since 1901. He has three hundred and twenty acres, about forty acres of which is in alfalfa meadow, thirty in grain and one and one-half acres in orchard. He has three miles of irrigation ditch and flume, receiving an abundance of water from Twenty-mile creek. His land will produce any variety of fruit or vegetable adapted to the temperate zone.

On November 27, 1896, Mr. Pope was married to Mary L. Clark, a native of Lake City, situated in Surprise valley, California. Her father, John A. Clark, was a native of Arkansas, who came to Oregon in 1856, and a short time later removed to Surprise valley. He was one of the pioneer settlers of that valley, and served during the Piute Indian war as a volunteer soldier. He has been engaged in the stock business the greater part of his life since coming west, and is now living on Twenty-mile creek, Lake county, Oregon. Mrs. Pope's mother was Jane A. (Ford) Clark, born at Yreka, California, and died at Plush, Oregon, on March 12, 1893.

L. N. KELSAY is the editor and proprietor of the Central Oregonian. It is a sheet of great merit considering that it has been but a short time in the field and especially does it show forth excellent judgment in its policies and general make-up which but reflect Mr. Kelsay's probity and substantiality. Less than two years have passed since the first issue of the Central Oregonian appeared and it has so unmistakably voiced the proper sentiment that it is the exponent of the progressive element of the community and Mr. Kelsay well deserves the patronage of all, being entitled to win success in his chosen field.

L. N. Kelsay was born in Lane county, Oregon, on November 4, 1878, and received his educational training in the public schools of Wasco county and the Portland University, from which latter institution he graduated with honors in 1901. Hon. William Kelsay, his father, was a native of Kentucky, being born June 11, 1831. In 1853 he crossed the plains with ox teams and settled on the homestead in Lane county and engaged in farming and stock raising there until 1885, then he removed to Wasco county and embarked in sheep raising, which he followed for several years. Then he disposed of these interests and is now engaged in the real estate business at Shaniko, this state. He is a veteran of the Rogue River Indian War and draws a pension from the government. In 1886, he represented Lane county in the state legislature.

He married Miss Lucy M. Saylor, a native of Iowa. Her father, the maternal grandfather of our subject, was a farmer and also a native of Iowa and crossed the plains with ox teams to Oregon in 1853.

Following his graduation, our subject worked one year as a freight agent for the Shaniko Warehouse Company at Shaniko but being possessed of a desire to enter journalism, he bought an interest in the Shaniko Leader in 1902 and set to learn the printer's trade. In the spring of 1903, he sold his interest in the Leader and removed to Silver Lake, Oregon, and founded the Central Oregonian which he is at present conducting. He has closely identified himself with the interests of the country and has so voiced its resources through the columns of the Oregonian that he has won much attention to this section of Oregon. The result is, the country is being invaded annually with home seekers and in a short time we may expect a large population in this favored region.

At Paisley, Oregon, on the 28th day of October, 1903, occurred the marriage of Mr. Kelsay and Miss Georgia Tribou, the daughter of George F. and Annetti (Tucker) Tribou. Mrs. Kelsay was born on May 8, 1885, at Portland and her father, a pioneer of Oregon, died in 1886. Her mother married a second time, R. L. Sherlock becoming her husband, and they now reside at Paisley, this state. Mr. and Mrs. Kelsay have one child, Leston Lovelle, who was born January 12, 1905. Mr. Kelsay is a good strong Republican and voices the principles of that party with ability through the columns of his paper. He is a man of great clearness and has ability to expound his belief in a very convincing manner. The result is, he has an interested and increasing circle of readers. He is a progressive and enterprising man, takes a keen interest in everything for the upbuilding of the country and is especially active to build up educational facilities. He and his wife have won many friends during their stay in Silver Lake and are popular young people.

GEORGE F. MAUPIN was born in Shelby county, Missouri, January 10, 1858, the son of Charles M. and Elizabeth (Barton) Maupin, the former a native of Virginia and the latter of Kentucky. The father served during the Civil War under General Price, of the confederate army, and died in Missouri, in August, 1896. The mother is now living, at the age of eighty-two years, in Clarence, Missouri.

The brothers and sisters of Mr. Maupin are, Daniel, Roscoe, Charles M., Mrs. Mary R. Kirby, John T. and Fannie Maupin, all of whom are still residents of Missouri with the exception of the last named brother, who resides in the Warner valley, Oregon.

Mr. Maupin grew to manhood in his native county and state and came west to Glenn county, California, in 1882. He came to Warner valley in December, 1888, and engaged in riding the range as a cowboy. Soon afterward, however, he took a pre-emption claim and engaged in the cattle business. In September, 1900, he entered the sheep business in conjunction with his cattle business, and now has large numbers of each of these animals and is making a success of his business. His home is one and three-fourths miles south from Warner Lake postoffice, where he has two hundred and forty acres of choice land. His land is well improved and is irrigated by the Twenty-mile creek ditch. Alfalfa, natural hay, and fruit are his principal products.

Mr. Maupin was married March 3, 1895, to Mrs. Ella (Brooks) Platt, a native of the state of California. At the time of her marriage to Mr. Maupin, Mrs. Platt was the mother of three children, Anna, Dora and Rufus. Mr. and Mrs. Maupin are parents of three children, Myrtle I., Grace V. and George E.

Mr. Maupin is a member of the Eagles fraternity, and one of the prominent citizens of his locality. Upon coming to Warner valley in 1888, his entire estate consisted of one horse and a buck-board, but he is now rated as being in comfortable circumstances.

RICHARD L. SHERLOCK is a prominent wool grower of Summer Lake valley, residing on a sheep ranch one and one-half miles south from Summer Lake postoffice. He was born in County Cork, Ireland, December 14, 1852. His father, Thomas Sherlock, now deceased, was a prominent attorney at law in Ireland. His mother, Mary C. (Kingston) Sherlock, is also dead.

Mr. Sherlock was educated in his native country, and at the age of sixteen he and a brother, Thomas H. Sherlock, went to New Zealand and engaged in the sheep business, following it successfully until 1871, when they came to Humboldt county, California, and continued in raising sheep there. In 1872 our subject came to Lake county, where he engaged to work on a ranch as a herder of sheep. He has the distinction of having put up the first crop of hay ever harvested in the Silver Lake valley. Two of his brothers were here at that time; Thomas H., who came in 1871, and Charles E. They formed a partnership in the sheep business, in which business our subject has been engaged continuously since, with the exception of two years he spent in the Klondike at the time of the memorable rush to that country in 1898. He has always prospered in his business and is now one of the wealthy wool growers of Lake county.

He was married in 1886, and is now the father of three daughters. Mr. Sherlock, being one of the pioneers of Lake county, was in the country during the Modoc Indian war, during which he saw many hardships and had many narrow escapes.

Richard L. Sherlock is regarded as one of Lake county's most substantial citizens and at one time was chosen by the voters as member of the board of county commissioners.

LORENZO D. FRAKES is a farmer and stock raiser residing in Warner Lake valley. He is a native of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, born June 24, 1864, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Nathan M. Frakes. The father was born in Kalamazoo, Michigan, in 1841, and died in Warner Lake valley, August 22, 1904. In 1873 he came to Glenn county, California and in 1887 to Warner Lake valley. The mother, who is now Mrs. P. A. Flower, is living, at the age of eighty-four, in Warner Lake valley. Her ancestors were prominent in the early history of the United States, some of them being soldiers in the Revolutionary War and her father served in the War of 1812, under Commodore Perry.

Our subject is the eldest of a family of five children. He has three brothers, Lewis N. Alonzo D., and Leon W., who are likewise stock men of Warner valley, and his only sister, Libbie L., died November 27, 1893.

Mr. Frakes grew to manhood at the home of his parents, and with them came to Warner Lake valley in 1887. The family remained united, all working in mutual partnership, until ten years ago, when our subject started in business for himself. He began an independent life by filing a preemption claim on a quarter section of land, to which he has since added by purchase one hundred and thirty acres, making him now the owner of two hundred and ninety acres in all. He has his land well improved, as to buildings, orchard, and so forth, and it all is under irrigation, his mother, brothers and himself owning irrigation ditches leading from Twenty-mile creek.

On October 22, 1895, Mr. Frakes was married to Mrs. Nellie (Green) Allen, a native of Eldorado county, California, and daughter of Benjamin F. and Sarah (Wilson) Green. To this union three children have been born, Nathan B., Lewis G. and Dow F.

Mr. Frakes has been deputy sheriff of his county during the past five years, and is one of the most prominent citizens of Warner Lake valley. He is doing a prosperous business, raising cattle almost exclusively, of which he has a large herd. He is now in comfortable circumstances financially, notwithstanding the fact that he started in life in this county almost without means.

WILLIS E. SCAMMON was born February 18, 1862, in Stanislaus county, California. He is now a stock raiser residing at Plush, Oregon.

His father is Benjamin Scammon, a native of the state of Maine, who, in 1849, came via the Panama route to California. Mr. Scammon's mother was Mary Jane Scammon, also a native of Maine. She came west with her husband, and some years later the two took a trip up the Fraser river to Alaska, and Mrs. Scammon is supposed to have been the first white woman in that country. Their journey was one beset with many perils, and while still in the far North Mrs. Scammon was stricken ill and had to be carried out by men a distance of three hundred miles. She died in 1896, the father of our subject being now a resident of Surprise valley, California.

Elsworth Scammon, a brother of the subject of this sketch, is now county recorder of Modoc county, California, and another brother, R. R. Scammon, is a resident of Humboldt county, California. He also has one sister.

The early boyhood of Mr. Scammon was spent in San Joaquin valley, and in 1871 he came with his parents to Surprise valley. At the age of fourteen years he left home and went to Harney valley, Oregon, and worked on the stock ranch of Hardin & Taylor. He was in this valley at the time of the Bannock Indian war, and it was he who carried the dispatch from Harney valley to Camp creek, warning the settlers of the sudden hostility of the Indians. After this war Mr. Scammon worked on the ranch of Mr. Hudspeath for thirteen years, the latter three years of which time he was foreman of the ranch, and then took a homestead on Rock creek and engaged in the stock business for himself. He sold his ranch and came to Plush in 1901. Here he purchased two hundred and forty acres of land, the most of which is meadow land and now well improved as to buildings, and so forth. He also owns the store building at Plush. His stock business consists chiefly in raising draft horses, mules, and some cattle. He has a stallion of the English Shire breed that weighs twenty-two hundred pounds.

In 1898 Mr. Scammon was married to Mrs. Lena Sweet. Mrs. Scammon had at the time of her marriage to our subject, two children, Maud, wife of Joseph Fine, of Warner valley; and Alfred Sweet, now a student in the Cedarville, California, high school.

WILLIAM P. MOULDER formerly was a prominent stock raiser of Warner Lake valley, but now is a resident of Plush, Oregon. Born March 14, 1835, in Tennessee, he was the son of John and Margaret (Yadon) Moulder, and was the eldest of a family of four children. He has one brother, Thomas D. Moulder, in Indian Territory, and two sisters; Mrs. Mary Byrum, of Fort Smith, Arkansas; and Mrs. Caladonia Voucher, of Kansas City, Kansas.

Early in life he went with his parents to Alabama, and from that state to Fort Smith, Arkansas. In 1854 he crossed the plains with Bennett & West's train to the San Joaquin valley, California. Here and at other points in California, he followed mining until 1861, when he went to the Walla Walla valley, in Washington, in the employ of the government as wagonmaster in the army. He was in the service of the United States government continuously until 1891, serving in the capacity of wagon-master, pack-master, guide and scout. During this time he saw service in the Pinto, Modoc and Bannock Indian wars, being wounded repeatedly by gunshot and arrows, and travelled through southern Oregon, California and Nevada. He was in Warner valley as early as 1866 before there were any white settlers here. In 1892 he located a homestead where Adel postoffice now stands and engaged in ranching and sheep raising. He followed this occupation until 1902, when he sold his interests and retired from active life.

JOSEPH HOWARD is a stock raiser residing twenty-four miles west from Lakeview, where he maintains the half-way house on the Klamath Falls stage road between Lakeview and Bly. He was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, August 21, 1852, the son of James W. Howard, a native of England, and Emily Howard, a native of New Jersey. The father came from England with his brother and two sisters, Joseph W., now of Lakeview, and Betsy and Maria Howard, who are living in Philadelphia. Mr. Howard, senior, was a mechanic by trade, and died in Philadelphia. The mother, now aged seventy-seven years, is still living in Philadelphia.

The brothers and sisters of our subject are, James, William, Mrs. Anna Miller, and George. The brothers are all well-to-do business men of Philadelphia. During his sojourn in the Quaker City our subject followed the business of teaming. He was married in that city in 1875 to Plyner Taylor, who was born in England, and who came to the United States with her parents as a child.

Mrs. Howard's father, now deceased, was James Taylor, who served as a volunteer during the entire Civil War. The mother, Mary Taylor, also is dead.

In September, 1886, Mr. Howard came to Lake county, Oregon, having been preceded here by an uncle. He purchased his present home and engaged in the stock business. He and his sons now own three thousand acres of land, the greater portion of which is adapted to the culture of hay, in Drew's valley. All of this tract is fenced and well improved in regard to house, barns, and so forth. They are doing a successful business and own some of the best bred cattle, sheep and horses in the valley.

To Mr. and Mrs. Howard have been born five children: Walter, Frank, Oliver, married to Ida Humphrey, Ida, and Eva Howard. Each of the sons owns his own ranch and some stock.

DANIEL CHANDLER has an extensive stock ranch on the Lakeview and Klamath Falls stage road twenty-one miles west from Lakeview, upon which he lives during the summer months, and he also owns a fine modern home in the city of Lakeview where he lives with his family during the school year in order to give his children the advantages of the city school.

Born January 13, 1854, in Dane county, Wisconsin, Mr. Chandler is the son of Bazelial S. and Rebecca M. (McKinney) Chandler. The mother died in 1902, in Lakeview, while the father is still living in that city, being over eighty years of age. Bazelial Chandler is a native of the state of Ohio and was an early pioneer of Dane county, Wisconsin. He served two years during the Civil War, the second year being spent in a hospital as an attendant, and he was an active participant in many of the most bloody battles of the struggle. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and is now living a quiet life in his own home in Lakeview.

Mr. Chandler is a member of a family of nine children, seven of whom are still living. Omitting our subject, their names are: Salmon B., Lakeview; Mrs. Mary E. Kinsey, Lakeview; James A.; Mrs. Adell A. Tucker, and Heaton L., of Lakeview. Two sisters, Armonia A. and Ellen are dead.

At the age of seven Mr. Chandler went with his parents to Fayette county, Iowa, and in the fall of 1866 he came with them via the New York and Panama route to San Francisco, and settled in Yolo county, California. Here the father took a homestead and settled, but the son left home and went to Plumas county, California, and in the fall of 1875 he came to the Crooked Creek valley, Lake county, Oregon, and began work on a ranch for wages. Three years later he filed a homestead on the tract of land where he now lives and began to make improvements on his land. He also invested the small amount of money he had in cattle and engaged in a small way in the stock business. In 1899 he went into the sheep business, which he still follows greatly to his profit. He has now a flock of a few thousand sheep, and a tract of seven hundred and forty acres of land. His ranch for the most part is natural meadow land, though he cultivates some timothy for hay. He makes a specialty of raising hay on his land to feed to his sheep. He now has his ranch in a high state of improvement in regard to fencing, buildings, and so forth.

When he first came to Drew's valley Mr. Chandler found a few settlers, but all whom he found here then are gone elsewhere now, so in reality he is the pioneer inhabitant of the valley.

On June 1, 1886, Mr. Chandler was married to Elva C. Sanders, daughter of Jacob and Kate Sanders, who now live near Avon, Washington. To this union seven children, all girls, have been born. Their names follow, Mabel F., Evalyn, Opal, Edith, Belle, Pearl and Leah.

Mr. Chandler is a member of the Woodmen of the World lodge of Lakeview. He is a prosperous and, one might say, wealthy man today, despite the fact that he came to the country absolutely without means.

JOHN A. MORRIS is engaged in the general merchandise business at Plush, Oregon, and it is in his store building that the Plush postoffice is located, Mrs. Morris being the postmistress. Mr. Morris carries a complete line of groceries, clothing, hardware, and so forth, his store being run according to strictly modern and up-to-date methods.

Born, February 14, 1869, Mr. Morris is a native of Dade county, Missouri, and the son of William and Sarah Elizabeth Morris, who are now living in Jackson county, Oregon.

During early life Mr. Morris came west with his parents and grew to manhood in Jackson county, Oregon, where his father followed the business of mining. Our subject received a thorough common school education, and worked with his father in the mines. In 1890 he came to Warner valley and engaged in the occupation of a cow-boy in the employ of the "J. J." ranch. Six years later he engaged in the stock business for himself, raising cattle and horses. Afterward, selling his cattle, he returned to the employ of the "J. J." ranch. He now has a large drove of horses, some of which are of large draft breed and choice animals. In 1904 Mr. Morris purchased the store, residence, barn and twenty acres of ground, belonging to Daniel Boone, in Plush, and is now engaged in the management of his business, of which he is making a success.

On Christmas day, 1899, Mr. Morris was married to Daisy Overton, a native of Fort Bidwell, California. The father of Mrs. Morris is living in Curry county, Oregon, and her mother is now Mrs. James N. Givan, a resident of Warner valley.

To Mr. and Mrs. Morris have been born two children: Hallie Evlyn and Raymond Morris.

Mr. Morris is a member in good standing of the Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F. He is a prominent man of the county and is in prosperous circumstances, although he started in life here practically without means.

NEHEMIAH FINE. Born March 20, 1858, in Petaluma, Sonoma county, California, Nehemiah Fine is now a wealthy stock raiser residing ten miles east from Plush, Lake county, Oregon. His father was Fred E. Fine, a native of Missouri, and one of the earliest pioneers of California, he having crossed the plains to where San Francisco now stands prior to the advent of that great city. During the latter part of his life he was engaged in the stock business in Sonoma county, and died in Marion county in 1894. The mother was Jane (Cushenburg) Fine, a native of California.

Our subject was reared on a stock ranch, and during his early life lived in different sections of the state of California. While residing in Merced, San Joaquin county, he was married to Rose Hageland, a native of Illinois, who came to California while a child. Her parents were Walker and Jane Hageland.

In 1878 Mr. Fine brought his family to Lake county, Oregon. This was during the time that the Bannock and Pinto Indians were on the war path, and many were the hardships and dangers that the early settlers of Warner valley were compelled to undergo on account of this fact. Upon first coming here Mr. Fine filed a preemption and homestead claim on the land where he now makes his home, and engaged in the stock business. He now has a large herd of cattle and an equal number of horses, and his realty holdings consist in fourteen hundred and forty acres of land, the greater part of which is suitable to the culture of hay and grain. He came to the county without a dollar, but was an industrious, hard-working man and a skillful manager of business and stock, and is now, as was stated at the beginning of this sketch, one of the well-to-do citizens of Warner Lake valley.

Mr. and Mrs. Fine have been parents of two children, a son and a daughter. The son, Joseph Walker, is married to Maud Sweet, has one child, Charlotte, by name, and is a stock raiser of Warner valley. Their daughter, Maud, lives at home with her parents. Both the children have been well educated by their parents.

Mr. Fine is a member of the A. O. U. W. fraternity of Lakeview.

WALTER D. TRACY is a farmer and dairyman residing twenty miles west from Lakeview, Oregon, on one of the most valuable tracts of land in that locality. He has in all five hundred and sixty acres of land, about one-half of which is natural meadow and under irrigation, producing an abundance of feed for his large herd of dairy stock. All of his land is well improved and under fence.

Mr. Tracy is a native of Clayton county, Iowa, born November 21, 1864, the son of John S. and Malissa (Baker) Tracy, the former a native of Illinois and the latter, of New York. John S. Tracy was an early pioneer of Clayton county, Iowa, and came to California in 1876, settling in Shasta county, where he still lives at the age of sixty-four years. His father, James Tracy, came from Ireland to Illinois and died in Iowa at about the age of eighty years. The mother of Walter D. Tracy removed in early life with her parents to Iowa, where she was married. She came west with her husband and died in Shasta county, California twenty-two years ago.

The brothers and sisters of Mr. Tracy are, Charles C., Mrs. Clara Tooney, John O., and Ernest F., all residents of Sacramento, California.

Mr. Tracy came west with his parents and grew to manhood on a farm. In the spring of 1884 he came to Silver Lake, Oregon, where he obtained work for a short time, after which he took a homestead and preemption in Drew's valley and engaged in improving his land and raising stock. This land he sold in 1897, when he purchased his present farm.

On November 17, 1886, Mr. Tracy was married to Miss Nannie Barker, a native of Shasta county, which union has been blessed with five children, Lawrence E., Joe E., Agnes E., Douglas O. and Roy A.

Mrs. Tracy was a daughter of George and Mary Barker, who came via Panama to Shasta county in very early days. Her grandparents were about the first who crossed the plains with an ox team and settled in Shasta county, where both they and Mrs. Tracy's parents since have died.

In fraternity life Walter D. Tracy is associated with the Woodmen of the World and is a member of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F. Both he and Mrs. Tracy are members of the Rebekah degree of Oddfellowship and Mrs. Tracy belongs to the Women of Woodcraft.

Mr. Tracy deserves great credit for his present high standing among his social and business associates, as he started in life in his present locality with hardly a dollar to his name. He is a man of pluck and energy, honor and integrity,—qualities which have won him a place in the confidence and esteem of a wide circle of friends.

ALBERT STEPHEN DOWN has followed the sea a great many years and probably has seen as much of the world as any man in the state of Oregon. He is now a farmer and stock raiser residing two and one-half miles south from Lakeview, Oregon, where, he says, he is content to spend the remaining years of his life. He is a native of the historic city of Hastings, England, born July 9, 1837, the son of John and Mary (Stace) Down. The latter attained the age of seventy-eight years, dying in Hastings, October 8, 1895. Mr. Down is the eldest of a family originally comprising four children, only two of whom, himself and his youngest sister, are living. This sister is now Mrs. Mary Ann Clark, and is living at Hastings, England. She and her brother have not met since she was two years of age.

Mr. Down went to sea on board a fishing boat at the age of ten years, and remained with this craft for four years, after which time he shipped with a merchant vessel as a common seaman. He was at his home in Hastings for the last time in 1855, thence went to Gothenburg, Sweden. He was in Constantinople in 1856, when peace was declared between Russia and the allied powers. From this city he voyaged to different parts of the civilized and uncivilized world, and in 1858 he left the sea to engage in mining in Australia. There he became interested in many different mines, but in 1866 he abandoned the business and sailed for San Francisco, California, arriving at that city March 25, 1866. He left his ship and went to Sonoma county, where for four years he worked in the redwoods, and on February 23, 1870, he was married to Carrie Elizabeth Ballard, a native of Atchison, Missouri.

Mrs. Down crossed the plains in a "prairie schooner" with her father in 1862, to Sonoma county. Her parents were Smithfield and Delina Ballard.

In 1878 Mr. and Mrs. Down went to Colusa county, California, and in the spring of 1879 came to the Goose Lake valley, Oregon, and settled eleven miles west from Lakeview. Mr. Down purchased his present home in 1896. He has two hundred and sixty acres of land, the major portion of which is choice hay land and well improved with good farm buildings, orchard, and so forth. Formerly, Mr. Down owned sheep, but he has disposed of them and is now engaged in raising cattle and horses in connection with farming.

To Mr. and Mrs. Down have been born six children: Mrs. Effie Vernon, Lakeview; George, married to Myrtle Grimes, Lakeview; Mary, wife of Flint Vernon, Lakeview; James, deceased since 1886; Anna, wife of Homer Pollard, San Jose; and Stephen. The first named has five children, the second, one, and the third, four.

Mr. Down was made a Mason in 1868 and is now a member of the Lakeview lodge of that order. Both he and Mrs. Down are members of the Eastern Star.

FRANK PEARSON LIGHT, in partnership with George D. Harrow, conducts the leading hotel in the city of Lakeview, Oregon. Their house is a three-story brick structure, containing sixty rooms, exclusive of parlor, dining room and kitchen, with a first-class bar in connection.

Born in Humboldt county, California, October 25, 1859, Mr. Light is the son of James and Mary (Pearson) Light, pioneers of Humboldt county. The father was born in Maine and reared to young manhood in Massachusetts. Early in life he took to the sea and before many years became captain on a merchant vessel. In 1846 he set sail from Boston and sailed around Cape Horn to San Francisco. Here he abandoned the sea and three years later he went to Humboldt county, being a member of the second party ever to penetrate that wild country, and his second son, Edwin A. Light, was the first white child born in that county. Mr. Light lived in Humboldt county until his death, which occurred in 1881. The mother died in the same county in 1875. The surviving children are, Monroe, Edwin A., our subject, and Mrs. Clara Yocum, all of whom, with the exception of our subject, are still residents of Humboldt county, California.

Mr. Light grew to manhood in his native county, came to Lakeview in the spring of 1880, and has made his home there ever since. In 1900 he engaged in partnership with F. M. Miller in the hotel business. Two years later Mr. Miller disposed of his interest in the business to Mr. Harrow, the present junior member of the firm, who is a pioneer of Lake county of about twenty-one years. Messrs. Light and Harrow conduct a first class and up-to-date hostelry and are doing a creditable business.

On May 8, 1901, Frank Pearson Light was married to Minnie Cannon, to which union one child, Amos Evans, has been born.

Mr. Light is a member and past grand of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F., and is also a member and past chief patriarch of Lakeview encampment No. 18. He belongs also to the Knights of Pythias order.

FRANK M. DUKE has a home consisting of two hundred and thirty-seven and one-half acres of land three miles south from Lakeview, where he is engaged in farming and stock raising. His land is well improved and is for the most part devoted to the growing of hay for feed for Mr. Duke's large herd of cattle.

Born April 18, 1861, Frank M. Duke is a native of Morgan county, Missouri. His father was William H. Duke, a native of Madison county, Kentucky, and went to Missouri at the age of nineteen years. He came to the Goose Lake country in 1876, and lived there until his death at the age of seventy-three years, March 18, 1904. William H. Duke's father was Patrick Henry Duke and his grandfather served in the patriot army during the Revolutionary War. Our subject's mother was Ann (Thompson) Duke, who was born, and who died, in Missouri.

Mr. Duke came west with his father in 1876. He began life for himself in 1882, his start being by working for a salary on a ranch. He located a homestead in 1888 and has been engaged in stock raising and farming since that time.

In 1904 Mr. Duke was the nominee of the Democratic party for the office of county sheriff, but owing to the great strength of the Republican party in Lake county, and to the popularity of its nominee for the office to which Mr. Duke aspired, he was defeated at the polls.

Mr. Duke was married November 20, 1887, to Mary E. Feeler, born in Walla Walla county, Washington. Her father is Simon Feeler, a native of Indiana and an early pioneer of Walla Walla county. From Walla Walla he removed to California, then to Goose Lake valley, and lastly to the vicinity of Fruitland, Stevens county, Washington, where he is now living. Mrs. Duke's mother was Martha (King) Feeler, a native of the state of Missouri.

Mr. and Mrs. Duke are parents of one child, Lora Ethel Duke.

Mr. and Mrs. Duke are regarded as being among the most strictly moral and honorable residents of Lake county, and both are members of the Baptist church.

GEORGE H. SMALL resides one-half mile north of Silver Lake, where he has a magnificent estate of sixteen hundred acres well supplied with buildings and other improvements. Portions of the estate are irrigated from Silver creek and he makes a specialty of raising hay and stock. He is one of the prosperous men of the county and is doing a good business here. An account of his life will be interesting reading and it is with pleasure that we append it.

George H. Small was born on September 18, 1843, in Pettis county, Missouri. His father, George Small, a native of Kentucky, moved to Missouri in early days and crossed the plains with his family to Lane county, Oregon in 1853. Later, he removed to Glenn county, California, and there died. The mother Malinda (Hinch) Small, a native of Missouri, is also deceased. The children born to this worthy couple are named as follows: Mrs. Garrett Long, of Benton county; Mrs. Gabriel Stockton, of Glenn county, California; Mrs. A. V. Lane; George H., our subject; James M., of Silver Lake; Barton; Samuel; Mrs. David Mosby; Mrs. Jane Payne; Parthenia; Amanda, born on the plains. The last six named are deceased. Mr. Small assisted his father in bring the stock across the plains and although young, drove cattle every day that they traveled. The old donation claim in Lane county was the first home in the west, then the family moved to Glenn county as stated in another portion of this work. Our subject gained his education as best possible on the frontier and as early as 1872, came to the Chewaucan valley, secured a ranch and went to raising cattle. In 1878, he came to the Silver Lake valley and took a preemption and homestead and has added to this by purchase until he has the fine estate above mentioned. He has given his attention to farming and stock raising constantly since and has achieved a splendid success in this line, having now a good holding in property.

On July 6, 1879, Mr. Small married Mary Underwood, a native of Douglas county, Oregon. Hon. David C. Underwood, her father, was born in Middlesex, New York state, and came to California by way of Cape Horn in a sailing vessel in 1849. He worked in the mines on American river until the fall of 1850, then removed to Umpqua valley, Oregon, being one of the pioneers to that section. He took a donation claim near where Oakland, Oregon, is now situated, in June, 1857. There he remained until 1869, having married Eliza J. Long. He served one term in the state legislature and was the first county judge of Douglas county. He built the first court house of that county, the same being located on his farm. He participated in the Rogue River Indian War of 1856 and in 1862 enlisted in Company A, First Regular Oregon Volunteers, under Colonel E. D. Baker, with the expectation of going east to the seat of war. Owing the Colonel Baker's death, our subject remained in Oregon to keep the Indians quelled. He was with the command that located Fort Klamath and had charge of the same. He was very instrumental in bringing about the treaty with the Indians which was concluded there. He participated in many skirmishes with the Indians but was never wounded. In 1869, he received his honorable discharge as first lieutenant, and in the same year went to Cottage Grove where he engaged in the mercantile business until 1877, when he removed to Eugene and there operated as a broker in partnership with his brother, J. B. Underwood, until his death on August 14, 1882, being then aged fifty-two. He married Eliza J. Long, a native of Missouri who crossed the plains with her father, John Long, when eleven years of age. This was in the early forties and they were a part of the Donner party. She died at Pacific beach, California, on May 30, 1904, in her seventieth year. Mrs. Small has the following named brothers and sisters: Hiram E., of Cottage Grove; David M., deceased; John M., of Oelrich, South Dakota; Anna E. Underwood, of Tacoma, Washington; Mrs. George Wall, a physician of Cottage Grove; Mrs. A. E. Johnson, of Pacific Beach, California; and Mrs. C. E. Hubbard, of Pacific Beach, California. The last named is a half sister of Mrs. Small. To Mr. and Mrs. Small three children have been born, namely: Malinda,

Mr. and Mrs. George H. Small

Mr. and Mrs. John A. Foster

a graduate of the agricultural college of Corvallis and now teaching in the public schools of Silver Lake; Lora M., a graduate of the Portland business college and a stenographer; and Irvin Earl, a student of the agricultural college at Corvallis. In addition to property already mentioned, Mr. Small owns eleven hundred acres of grazing land in Thompson valley and his stock consists of horses and cattle of which he has a large number. He was active in pioneer days and has done very much to build up the country. During the Indian uprising in 1873, he was one of the settlers who assisted to drive the savages out of the Chewaucan valley. He has ever shown himself a man of worth and ability and he and his wife are leading people in Lake county.

JOHN A. FOSTER resides some six miles south of Summer Lake postoffice on the west bank of Summer Lake. He has a splendid farm of two hundred acres extending for a mile and more along the lake front and here he has resided for many years. The farm is well improved and equipped with a good six room residence, barns and other outbuildings and is one of the choice ones of the county. It is so situated that it is especially adapted for raising both grain and fruit as well as all kinds of vegetables. Mr. Foster has an orchard that contains every kind of fruit adapted to this climate and he has made a great success in this line. He raises corn, tomatoes, watermelons in abundance and potatoes grow so thrifty that the larger ones will weigh over four pounds apiece. In addition to general farming, Mr. Foster pays great attention to handling blooded stock; he has between thirty and fifty Shorthorn animals all prize winners and from the best strains imported into this state by Mr. Miner of Heppner, Oregon. One animal that Mr. Foster owns weighs over two thousand pounds and is still under three years of age. In all his labors here, Mr. Foster has met with the success deserved by his thrift, wisdom, and stability and he is one of the leading men in this part of the country. This valley where he resides has always been famous for its wild game, such as almost every kind of fowl, besides bear, cougar, deer and other animals. It is still a great paradise for the sportsman.

John A. Foster was born December 29, 1851, near Corvallis, Oregon. His parents were James and Elizabeth (Currier) Foster. He grew up on the old homestead with his parents in Benton county and there received his education. As early as 1872, he came to Summer Lake valley, being among the very first settlers here. He located on his present place, taking it as a homestead and for over thirty years, he has resided here. He came in as a sturdy young pioneer with no means except two good strong hands and abundance of grit, and everything that he now possesses is the result of his own labor and wisdom. In addition to the stock mentioned, which Mr. Foster raises, we should speak of the extra fine Poland China hogs which he is breeding. He has very good success in this enterprise and has some choice animals as well as some fine horses.

On June 19, 1890, Mr. Foster married Laura Mercer, who was born near Monroe, Oregon. Her father, George Mercer, was a native of Ohio and crossed the plains to Oregon with ox teams in 1853. His parents both died when he was a child and he was forced early to meet the hardships of the world but his fund of determination and genuine grit, enabled him to make the best of life and although not favored with schools, he gained a good education and soon was able to teach school which he did for some time. Then he followed merchandising and also was surveyor of Benton county, which office he held for almost twenty years. He is now living a retired life on his farm near Corvallis, this state. He is a member of the A. F. & A. M. and the I. O. O. F. His birth occurred on January 15, 1829. The mother of Mrs. Foster, Elizabeth (Hilemon) Mercer, was born in New York state, on December 1, 1833. She crossed the plains one year before her husband did and they were married in the west. They now are both living a retired life and are highly esteemed people. For years they have been members and supporters of the Presbyterian church and have labored for all good enterprises. The children born to this venerable couple are Albert, Mrs. Foster, Frank, deceased, Lester, Walter, George and Bertha. To Mr. and Mrs. Foster, one child has been born, Earl Lawrence, on October 7, 1891. Mr. and Mrs. Foster are both members of the Methodist church and are highly respected people.

WILLIAM H. BLURTON who is operating a hotel and livery barn in New Pine Creek, was born on February 26, 1860, in Butte county, California. His father, John, was a native of Missouri and came across the plains with ox teams in 1858, making a settlement in Butte county, California. Later, he lived in Monterey county a short time then returned to Butte county and in 1872, came to Goose Lake valley. He settled near the mouth of Davis creek and engaged in stock raising there until his death in July, 1898. He had married Rachel L. Boydston, the wedding occurring in Missouri. She accompanied him across the plains and was a faithful helpmeet until his death. She is now residing in this valley. They were the parents of fourteen children, eight of whom are now living. Our subject was educated in the various places where his parents lived during his youthful days and accompanied them on their journey to this portion of Oregon in 1872. He was here during the ravages of the Modoc war, there being but few settlers in the valley at that time. At the age of thirteen, Mr. Blurton began the occupation of riding the range and soon became an expert horse breaker. He has handled some of the fiercest and most stubborn animals in this county and has always mastered them in fine shape. He has the reputation of being one of the best horsemen in the county. For a time, he had a band of stock on the range, then he sold out his horses and ranch and came to New Pine Creek. Here he purchased two acres of ground and erected a fine two story hotel of thirteen rooms and a fine livery barn, thirty-six by sixty-four feet. His hotel is well handled and a fine stopping place. His livery is supplied with all rigs and horses necessary and gives a first class service. Mr. Blurton is being prospered in his business and is one of the substantial men of the town.

On February 29, 1888, Mr. Blurton married Miss Annie Wallace and to them four children have been born, Edith May, Roy Earl, William Lee, and Crystal Lonson.

JAMES T. FITZGERALD is a farmer and stock raiser residing five miles south from Lakeview. He is a native of McMinn county, Tennessee, born June 3, 1830, and the son of Joseph B. Fitzgerald, a native of Jackson county, Tennessee, and Nancy (Thomas) Fitzgerald, also a native of Tennessee. The grandfather, also a native of Tennessee, was a veteran of the Indian wars of colonial days.

Mr. Fitzgerald grew to manhood in the state of his birth, acquiring a common school education in a subscription school held in a log house. He was married September 8, 1851, to Sarah Neil, who was born within five miles of the birth place of our subject, June 14, 1832. Her parents were John and Sarah (Lane) Neil, both natives of Tennessee. Her father was the son of Irish parents, and her mother's father was Isaac Lane, a soldier in the Revolutionary War, who lived to be ninety-eight years of age, when he was killed in an accident.

In 1859 Mr. and Mrs. Fitzgerald removed to Laclede county, Missouri, and remained there during the Civil War. Here they accumulated considerable property, but it was all destroyed by the soldiers during the war. During Price's last raid through that section Mr. Fitzgerald was informed by Colonel Cosgrove of the union troops that if he did not accompany his command he would be considered a bushwhacker, and as such be dealt with. Our subject was persuaded by this argument to become a member of Colonel Cosgrove's band, severing his connection with it thirty days later.

In the fall of 1870 Mr. Fitzgerald left Missouri and brought his family to Jackson county, Oregon and settled near Ashland. Two years later he was employed by the government as teamster in Major Wright's command, and served in that capacity during the Modoc War. After the war he returned to Ashland, and in May, 1873, came to Goose Lake valley, and located south of the present site of Lakeview. Lake county was at that time a part of Jackson county, and Mr. Fitzgerald was instrumental in having the present Lake county created and the county seat located at Lakeview.

Mr. Fitzgerald came to Ashland with only seventy-five cents to his name, but made some money during the Modoc War, and during the war he purchased a right to a claim seven miles south from Lakeview. When he came here to live he filed an additional homestead and began at once to improve his farm and he now has one of the pleasantest and most valuable homes in the valley. He has two hundred acres of land in all, the greater part of which is suitable to the growth of hay, and is under irrigation.

During his life here he has been constable and for two years he was deputy sheriff. He was made the Lakeview lodge of that order. He and Mrs. Fitzgerald are members of the Baptist church. They have been parents of five children: Nancy J., wife of John O'Neil, of Pine Creek; Montez, who died in Missouri; Esther N., wife of Loyal Carter, Santa Rosa, California; John N., married to Bertha Pike, Lakeview; and George C. Fitzgerald, who is a wool grower of Lake county and a partner with his father in the stock business.

C. OSCAR METZKER is the editor and publisher of the Lake County Examiner, published in Lakeview, which is the leading newspaper in that section of the state of Oregon. He is also engaged in a prosperous real estate business in connection with the management of his newspaper. Mr. Metzker received his first experience in the newspaper business in 1894, when he became connected with the Examiner as a printer. He worked in this capacity until February, 1901, when he went to Paisley, Oregon, and established the Chewaucan Post, which publication he managed successfully for three years, when he sold out and in March, 1904, he purchased the Examiner. This paper was founded in 1880, and for a number of years thereafter was the only paper in Lake county. It always has been one of the most influential newspapers in Southern Oregon.

Mr. Metzker was born January 19, 1869, in Yamhill county, Oregon, and was reared to the age of twenty years on a stock ranch. He received a good-common school education in the states of Oregon and California, which, together with the self-education which he has acquired, has amply qualified him for his chosen field of labor.

The father of the subject of our sketch, William Metzker, crossed the plains from Iowa in 1852, and settled near Portland. His father, John Metzker, was captain of the train of ox teams by which means the journey across the plains was made. He is now living in Portland at the age of eighty-six. William Metzker came to Goose Lake valley in 1869, removing to that section with his family one year later. He engaged in the stock business here and continued thus engaged until recently, when he removed to Modoc county, California, where he now lives. Our subject's mother, Tacy S. (Reese) Metzker, died in 1896.

Mr. Metzker was married November 19, 1901, to Renna V. Kearney.

In fraternity circles Mr. Metzker is identified with the Odd Fellows and A. O. U. W. societies. Of the former he is a member and past grand of Lakeview lodge No. 63, and is a past chief patriarch of Lakeview encampment No. 18.

DAVID H. HARTZOG is a prominent pioneer of Lake county and a farmer residing five miles south from Lakeview. He is a native of Hickman county, Tennessee, born April 13, 1847, the son of Richard and Susana Hartzog. The father was a soldier in the federal army during the Civil War.

Mr. Hartzog while still a child removed with his parents to Cooper county, Missouri, and during the latter part of the Civil War he enlisted and served for a brief term in the Union army. After the close of the Rebellion he went to Cedar county, Missouri, where he was married, in the year 1870, to Susan Eslinger, daughter of John and Martha Eslinger.

In 1874 he came west to Yolo county, California, and to Goose Lake valley the following year, arriving here August 5, 1875. He settled on a homestead and began at once to make improvements, in order to do which he was compelled to work for wages among the settlers round about. Mr. Hartzog was a judge of the election when it was voted to establish Lakeview as the county seat of Lake county, and was a juror of the first circuit court to sit in Lakeview. He has served four years as deputy sheriff of his county, and has held other prominent positions manifesting the confidence and trust reposed in him by his fellow-citizens.

When he first came to this locality Lakeview was unheard of, and Mr. Hartzog recalls the times when he has harvested hay on the land where the city now stands. He came to the country with only five dollars in currency and a span of ponies and a light wagon, but both he and Mrs. Hartzog have always been industrious, frugal people and their patient efforts brought reward in the form of a competence in the way of worldly goods, so that they now own six hundred and fifty acres, a part of which is as good land as can be found in the valley, the principal part of which is devoted to the raising of hay and cereal crops of all varieties and their farm is one of the best improved in Lake county. They have some cattle, horses and the other domestic animal commonly found on a well-regulated farm.

To Mr. and Mrs. Hartzog have been born eight children, four of whom are still living. Their names are; Edwin, married to Elma Funk, Pine creek; Pearl A., Clara L. and Mary Delphia, the three latter living at home.

Mr. Hartzog is a member of the Masonic fraternity, of Lakeview, and both he and Mrs. Hartzog are devout members of the Baptist faith. They have always taken an active interest in all things pertaining to the betterment of the community in which they live, especially through the medium of the church and school.

AHIRA W. MANRING came to Lake county, Oregon, in the spring of 1886 and began life here as a wage earner. Later he engaged in the sheep business, which he followed successfully until 1901. In the spring of 1902 he entered politics as the candidate of the Democratic party for the office of county clerk. At the polls he was victorious, though Lake county went Republican and the great majority of the Democratic candidates were defeated. He was re-nominated in 1904 and elected to succeed himself, receiving an increased majority of votes over his previous election, so is now serving his second term as clerk of Lake county.

Mr. Manring was born in Gallia county, Ohio, December 13, 1864. He was the son of Alvin and Nancy (Tanner) Manring, both of whom also were natives of Gallia county Ohio. He is the second in point of age of a family of eight children; Charles E., Whitman county, Washington; Ahira W.; Benjamin F., Lakeview, Oregon; Ora V., a pharmacist of Spokane, Washington; George W., Whitman county, Washington; Sanford A., Whitman county; Cora E., deputy county clerk of Lake county; and Edgar A., a harness merchant of Colfax, Whitman county, Washington.

At an early age our subject accompanied his parents to Gentry county, Missouri, and in the spring of 1878 the family crossed the plains in a "prairie schooner" to Whitman county, Washington, being among the early pioneers of that county. They settled on a homestead adjoining the present site of the town of Garfield, upon which the father lived until his death, which occurred during October, 1903. The mother died in 1895.

This farm was also our subject's home until he removed to Lake county, as stated above. He received a good common school education in Whitman county, and is amply fitted for the duties of the office to which the voters of his adopted county have elevated him.

In society and fraternity circles he is a man of considerable prominence. He is a member and past grand of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F., of the Rebekah degree, and the Encampment, No. 18, and also holds membership in Damon lodge, No. 31, Knights of Pythias, of Garfield, Washington.

THOMAS BENTON VERNON, ever since his advent into Lake county, has taken a most active part in the religious and educational progress of the county. He came here a poor man, financially, but he is now a well-to-do farmer and stock raiser residing on a two hundred and twenty-acre timothy and alfalfa farm five and one-half miles south from Lakeview. His land is all well improved, irrigated by water taken from Crane creek, and his farm buildings are of the latest and best models.

Mr. Vernon was born December 13, 1851, in Laclede county, Missouri. His father was Anderson Perry Vernon, of English ancestry, a native of Tennessee and a son of Col. Miles Vernon, an officer in the War of 1812. Col.

Miles Vernon also served in the state legislature of Missouri, representing Laclede county, for sixteen years. He died at St. Louis at the age of eighty years. The father of our subject settled in Missouri when a young man, and a few years later went to Texas, thence to Benton county, Arkansas. He came to Surprise Valley, California, in 1876 and the following fall located a homestead near where Lakeview now stands. Here he engaged in farming and stock raising until his death from cancer in 1901, aged seventy-eight years. While a resident of Missouri he enlisted in General Price's army, serving during the Civil war. The mother of our subject, who is now living on the old homestead near Lakeview, aged seventy-four years, is Dollie (Leathers) Vernon, and a native of Tennessee. Both parents have always been devoted members of the Baptist church. They reared a family of thirteen children, ten of whom are now living, nine sons and one daughter. Their names follow, Miles, Thomas B., Richard W., Sterling P., Elliott, Mrs. Grace Stanley,—the latter two being twins—Stonewall J., Flint, Hurley and Lester.

Mr. Vernon went with his parents to Texas and to Benton county, Arkansas, in 1866. He received a thorough common school education, and spent some time in college, and he taught school some years in Arkansas. He came to Siskiyou county, California, in 1875, and here engaged in school teaching until returning to Arkansas several months later. He was married January 6, 1876, to Mary F. Duckworth, a native of Benton county, Arkansas, and daughter of Johnathan P. and Nancy (Alexander) Duckworth, natives of Missouri and Bowling Green, Kentucky, respectively. The father of Mrs. Vernon emigrated to Arkansas when young and is now living in that state at the age of eighty-seven years. The mother died in August, 1902, aged seventy-six years. Mrs. Vernon is a member of a family originally comprising nine children, six of whom are living; Rev. Joseph Duckworth, Tahlequah, Indian Territory; Mrs. Vernon; Gideon, and George W., Benton county, Arkansas; Johnathan P., Lakeview; and Andrew J., Benton county, Arkansas.

Mr. and Mrs. Vernon went to Surprise valley California, in 1876, and the following year they came to Goose Lake valley, Oregon, where Mr. Vernon followed school teaching for several years. He was later appointed to fill a vacancy in the office of county school superintendent of Lake county, which then included Klamath, and was elected on the Democratic ticket to succeed himself upon the expiration of his term.

He now owns his handsome home, referred to above, and a quarter section of grazing land besides. He has some stock, consisting principally of cattle, with some horses, hogs and sheep.

Mr. and Mrs. Vernon have been parents of eight children: Perry Johnathan, deceased; Gertrude May, a graduate from Monmouth college, and now a teacher in the Moro, Oregon, schools; Minnie Ethel, Rilla Ann, deceased; William Pulaski, Harry, Grover, and Agatha Beryl.

Mr. and Mrs. Vernon are actively affiliated with the Baptist faith.

ELMER E. RINEHART is sheriff of Lake county, Oregon, having been elected to that office on the Republican ticket in the spring of 1904. He came to Lake county in 1894 and engaged in the saw mill business in partnership with Rhesa A. Hawkins, a pioneer of the county, under the firm name of Hawkins & Rinehart. Their plant is situated in the Crooked creek valley, where the company also owns a large tract of timber and agricultural lands. They are still running the mill with profit, and in addition they are quite extensively engaged in the business of cattle raising and farming.

Mr. Rinehart is a native of Chillicothe, Ohio, and was born January 29, 1864. His father, David G. Rinehart, is a native of Pennsylvania, but removed to Ohio about the time of the construction of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad. Upon the outbreak of the Rebellion he enlisted in the army and his military record covers a period of three and one-half years, during which time he was a participant in some of the most severe battles of the war, among which may be mentioned the battle of Bull Run. He is still living in Ross county, Ohio, at the age of eighty-two years. Our subject's mother was Elizabeth (Erlywine) Rinehart, a native of West Virginia. She had attained the age of sixty-five years when she died, in 1895.

Mr. Rinehart was a member of a family of eleven children, eight of whom are still living. The first twenty years of his life were spent in the state of his birth. In 1884 he came west and settled in Surprise valley, California. During his boyhood he mastered the trade of stationary engineer, and since coming to the west has followed that trade, his work being confined to the running of engines in lumber and grist mills.

On May 20, 1888, Mr. Rinehart was married to Addie Peters, a native of California, and daughter of Claus Peters, a German by birth, and a pioneer of California. Claus Peters was one of the first settlers in Surprise valley, and his death occurred there December 14, 1904. Mr. and Mrs. Rinehart have been parents of one child, a son by the name of Clarence D.

It may be said to the credit of Mr. Rinehart that he started in business in Lake county ten years ago without a dollar in his own name; but so diligently has he applied his energies to his business and so faithfully has he met all adversities that he is now in the best of circumstances and enjoys the good will of a wide circle of friends.

RUFUS K. FUNK resides seven and one-half miles south from Lakeview, where he follows the business of farming and stock raising. He is a native of Hocking county, Ohio, born December 31, 1853. His father was Abraham Funk, a native of the same county as is our subject, and son of Daniel Funk, born in Pennsylvania, and one of the pioneers of Ohio. Daniel Funk was the son of Rev. Christly Funk, of German birth, who came to America in 1750 and settled in Pennsylvania. Rev. Christly Funk was a captain under George Washington during the Revolutionary War, and was the father of seven sons, six of whom were in his company. The seventh, Daniel, was a teamster in General Washington's army. One of the sons, Abraham by name, is said to have lived to the age of one hundred and thirty years. The father of our subject removed to Macon county, Illinois, in 1863, where he died at the age of eighty-two years, in 1891. Our subject's mother, Martha (Crook) Funk, who was born in Hocking county, Ohio, and died in Illinois, at the age of seventy-two years, in 1885, was the daughter of George Crook, a Revolutionary War soldier. She was also first cousin to General Crook of Pacific coast Indian war fame. The brothers and sisters of Mr. Funk are, Mrs. Susan Beery, Henry, Daniel, Amos, Albert R., and John A. Funk. One brother, Noah, and two sisters, Mrs. M. Stiers and Mrs. Emma Dudrey are now deceased. All who are living reside in the eastern states.

Mr. Funk went with his parents to Macon county, Illinois, where he received a complete common school education. He taught school near his home for some time, then, in 1874, went to Texas, where he worked on various stock ranches and also in a cotton gin. He traveled extensively over the states of Texas, Missouri and Kansas, after which he returned to Illinois. In the spring of 1878 he started with a party of emigrants across the plains, arriving in Paradise Valley, Nevada, just in time to participate in the Bannock Indian war. He took an active and prominent part in this war, after which he returned to Illinois. Here he gathered together a party, formed an emigrant train of fifty-seven wagons and started on his second journey toward the west. He acted as captain and guide for the train. A large number of these emigrants came with him to the Goose Lake valley, where Mr. Funk has since made his home.

Mr. Funk arrived here without means, but took a claim and began at once to farm, later engaging, to a limited extent, in stock raising. He now has two hundred and eighty acres of choice land, good improvements, and a large herd of cattle and some horses. He has always taken an active interest in politics, and in 1892 was a delegate from the state of Oregon to the Populist convention in Omaha, Nebraska.

Mr. Funk was married January 28, 1877, in Macon county, Illinois, to Lydia King, a native of Pennsylvania, and daughter of Daniel and Elvina (Homm) King, the former a native of Pennsylvania, now living in Macon county, Illinois. The mother is now deceased. Both of Mrs. Funk's parents were of German ancestry.

To Mr. and Mrs. Funk have been born five children, Henry A., Elma E., now wife of Edwin Hartzog, Daniel G., Oran J., and Corda M.

Mr. and Mrs. Funk are pronounced Baptists in religious faith.

JOHN DAVID EDLER is a well-to-do wool grower of Klamath county, Oregon, residing principally in Lakeview. He was born May 27, 1865, in Perry county, Pennsylvania, the son of John and Doratha (Myers) Edler. He has one brother, Jacob, and one sister, Emma C. Edler, both residing in Crawford county, Kansas.

As a boy Mr. Edler removed with his parents to Illinois, and from that state the family emigrated to Crawford county, Kansas, where the father took a homestead, upon which he lived until his death, and upon which the mother is still making her home. In June, of the year 1885, Mr. Edler removed to Alturas, Modoc county, California, and during the following autumn came to Lake county, Oregon. He began life here as a sheep herder, but soon acquired capital sufficient to enable him to purchase a small flock of sheep of his own. With that start he has continued during subsequent years to add to his flock until his sheep now number several thousand. He also owns eighteen hundred acres of land twelve miles east of Bonanza, Klamath county, Oregon, the tract being known far and wide as the "Keno Springs ranch."

Mr. Edler is a member of the United Workmen lodge of Lakeview.

He is a man of great industry, as may be judged by the foregoing facts relating to his life, and is generally looked upon as one of the leading citizens of southern Oregon.

JAMES P. DUKE is a farmer and stock raiser, residing seven and one-half miles south from Lakeview, where he has four hundred and ninety acres of land, the major portion of which is devoted to the culture of hay and grain. His land is well improved, as to buildings, and so forth, and water is piped into his house from a near by spring. His stock consists chiefly of cattle, though he keeps a few head of horses and a small drove of swine. Although he came to the county in what might be called an impoverished condition, he is now considered to be well supplied with the good things of the earth.

Mr. Duke is a native of Benton county, Missouri, born January 25, 1859, the son of William H. and Ann (Thompson) Duke, the latter dying in 1865. Mr. and Mrs. William H. Duke reared a family of four children, John M., Mrs. Jennie Cogburn, James P. and Frank M. Duke. The father was married for the second time in 1869 to Mrs. Elizabeth Thurston, and to this union were born four children, Walter, Mrs. Anna Sherlock, Samuel, and Mrs. Estella Dunlop.

Our subject came to Lake county with his parents in 1876 and settled in the Goose Lake valley, where he worked with his father in the building of a home. In 1881 he went to work for wages and in 1890 he filed a preemption claim on his present home.

He was married January 8, 1893, to Minnie Myrtle, who was born about seven miles south from Pine creek in Modoc county, California. Mrs. Duke is the daughter of Horace D. and Nancy C. (Bogart) Myrtle, the latter now residing at the home of our subject. The father was one of the first settlers of Goose Lake valley, coming here in 1869. He was a native of the state of Kentucky, from which state he removed to Missouri. He was a veteran of the Mexican War and of the more recent Rogue River Indian war. He first crossed the plains to the Willamete valley during the early "50's", and died in 1883.

Mr. and Mrs. Duke are parents of four children, Lera, Essie, Ross, and Mildred.

Mr. Duke was among the first settlers of Goose Lake valley, and has seen all of the hardships and vicissitudes of pioneer life in the far west. Lakeview was unthought of at the time of his advent into the valley, although there was a small postoffice near the present site of the city, known as Lake postoffice, which received mail thrice a week. He takes a pardonable pride in the fact that he began life here in a raw country and without means, but is now in comfortable circumstances, all of which is the direct result of the hardest of toil.

WILLIAM JOSEPH MOORE was born May 22, 1862, in Adair county, Missouri. He was the son of John W. and Edna F. (Payton) Moore, the former a native of Indiana, who early in life removed to Illinois and later to Missouri, and the latter of Missouri. Mr. Moore has one brother and one sister, Charles A. Moore, a prominent attorney of Baker City, Oregon, and Mrs. Mary D. Moss, of Lakeview.

During boyhood Mr. Moore accompanied his parents from his native state to New York city, whence the family went by steamer over the Panama route to San Francisco, California. They settled in Shasta county, and in the autumn of 1870 returned by rail to Adair county, Missouri. Two years later they came again to Shasta county. In 1874 they again journeyed to their old Missouri home and four years later they returned to Shasta county, whence they came to Lake county, Oregon, and settled at Lakeview in June, 1878, which city is our subject's present home. The father, however, had in 1852, crossed the plains with ox teams passing through the Goose Lake country, to Yreka, California, but remained only a brief time before returning to Missouri. After about twenty years' residence here Mr. Moore, senior, removed to Crescent City, California, where he died February 15, 1901, aged sixty-four years. The mother is now living in Lakeview, aged fifty-nine years.

In 1893 Mr. Moore entered the law office of Judge E. D. Sperry in Lakeview, engaged in the study of law and four years later was admitted to the state bar. He is now a practitioner in all of the courts of the state of Oregon.

Mr. Moore has twice held the office of superintendent of schools of his county, his first election to that office having taken place in 1884. At that time Mr. Moore had just been graduated from the public school and had no actual experience as a teacher. He served two terms, being a candidate both times on the Democratic ticket. In addition to superintending schools he engaged in teaching. This occupation he followed in different sections of his county for several years. He had taken a homestead in the meantime, and worked hard as opportunities presented themselves at improving his land. He also engaged in a small way in the stock raising business. In 1894, while still a law student, he was again elected to the office of school superintendent, and in June, 1904, he was elected prosecuting attorney for the second district of Oregon, which includes the counties of Lake and Klamath. He was elected as a Democrat by fifty majority, notwithstanding the fact that his district went Republican by upwards of four hundred majority.

July 6, 1885, occurred the marriage of our subject and Miss Anna H. Moss, a native of Linn county, Oregon. Mrs. Moore's father, Hon. S. P. Moss, is a pioneer of Lake county, and a well-to-do stock man residing near Paisley. Her mother in maiden life was Sarah Robnett, and is now deceased.

To Mr. and Mrs. Moore five children have been born: William C., deceased; Frank S., a student of Lakeview high school; Ralph A., deceased; Bessie and Beatrice, twins.

In lodge circles Mr. Moore is identified with the I. O. O. F., Rebekah degree, Woodmen of the World and the United Workmen. He is past grand of Lakeview lodge of Odd Fellows and for several years has held the office of scribe in Encampment No. 18. Mrs. Moore also is a member of the Rebekah degree.

Our subject is owner of five hundred and sixty acres of land in Lake county, and a fine home and two-acre plot of ground in Lakeview. He also owns the Lakeview Herald, a newspaper published in Lakeview, and for two and a half years past has been its editor and manager. He now leases the plant to other parties.

Mr. Moore is a man of exemplary habits and of high standing in his community, which fact is attested by the very complimentary vote he has received whenever his name has been before the public for election to office. He is an enthusiast in matters appertaining to education and has held some office in connection with this good work almost continuously since he left school. At present he is a member of the board of directors of Lakeview school district, which position he has occupied for the past six years.

GEORGE VINCENT is a farmer residing one and one-fourth miles north from New Pine Creek. He was born June 17, 1843, in Scotland county, Missouri, the son of John and Matilda (Moore) Vincent, both natives of Virginia. The father was born in 1803 and died at Pine Creek in 1886 at the age of eighty-six years. His father, Josiah Vincent, was a participant in the battle of Waterloo. The present Vincent family descended from two brothers who came originally from Scotland and settled in Virginia early in the life of the American republic. Mr. Vincent's mother's ancestors were of Revolutionary fame.

Our subject remained in Missouri until attaining the age of seventeen years, when the Civil War broke out and he went to Wapello county, Iowa. Here he enlisted in the Seventeenth Iowa Cavalry as a member of Company C, and served three years and three months in the federal army. Later he was sent west to protect the frontier settlers from the ravages of the hostile Indian tribes and while on this mission was engaged in many hot skirmishes in New Mexico, Colorado and Kansas. Returning to Iowa he was married during March, 1868, to Maggie Jackson, a native of Nodaway county, Missouri. In the spring of 1869 Mr. and Mrs. Vincent came west to Jackson county, Oregon, and the spring following to Goose Lake valley, where they have since lived, with the exception of a few months spent in the Willamette valley in 1870.

When Mr. and Mrs. Vincent first came to what is now Lake county there were but few settlers here, and many hardships had to be endured in starting a home. Mr. Vincent purchased his present home of eighty acres upon which now stands the first log school house ever erected in the county, built in 1872.

His home is well improved by a first class house, with barn and other outbuildings to correspond, and contains four acres of thriving orchard. He makes a specialty of raising grain, although he each year harvests a large quantity of hay.

Mr. and Mrs. Vincent have two children: William, married to Nora Smith, and James, married to Cora Martin. The former has four children and the latter two; both have homes adjoining that of their parents.

Each member of the family belongs to the Baptist church.

CHARLES S. LOVELESS resides five and one-half miles north from Lakeview at the well known road station, Warner Canyon or Loveless Place. He was born on January 2, 1862, in Plumas county, California. J. W. Loveless, his father, better known as "Dave" Loveless, was born and reared in Essex county, New York. He went to the lumber woods in Wisconsin then to Iowa and later to Louisiana and Mississippi. In 1857, he journeyed from Iowa across the plains to California and did mining and trapping. He returned to Iowa and married Emma Miller and the next year crossed the plains and located in Plumas county, California. His wife died there, leaving one child, the subject of this sketch. In June, 1871, Mr. Loveless journeyed to Oregon, settling on the Crooked creek in what is now Lake county, being the second settler in that valley. Very few people were in the entire country and the nearest postoffice was Willow ranch, a distance of thirty-eight miles. During the Modoc War, Mr. Loveless carried the mail on snowshoes from his place to Camp Warner. He was a large and very powerful man and has been known to carry ninety pounds of mail at one load. The first fourteen winters after coming to Oregon, he spent on snow shoes, trapping and carrying the mail. He was also engaged in stock raising. In January, 1884, Mr. Loveless contracted a second marriage, Roberta A. Davis becoming his wife at that time. She died in December, 1889, leaving two children, Frank D. and Lena A. Mr. Loveless was very successful financially and was one of the foremost citizens of the country. He died in 1901, being then seventy-one years of age. Our subject has spent most of his life in this county and grew up with his father on the frontier and early learned the stock business. He used to herd his father's sheep and soon he went into the sheep business for himself. In 1901, he purchased the place where he now resides, which consists of four hundred and forty acres of land, half of which is excellent hay land and the balance is timber and pasture. He has a fine eight room residence, very large barn, plenty of other outbuildings and all improvements needed on the farm. He makes a specialty of raising hay and keeping the traveling public and is widely known as a very generous and hospitable man.

He is a member of the A. O. U. W. and Foresters and has always taken a great interest in building up the country and especially in educational matters.

On April 15, 1891, occurred the marriage of Mr. Loveless and Cora B. Sloan, who was born in Leavenworth county, Kansas, the daughter of Lemuel D. and Henrie (Cuthenthal) Sloan, natives of Kentucky and Missouri, respectively. Mrs. Loveless has one brother, William Albert and one sister, Mrs. Winifred Huff, the former older and the latter younger than she. Mrs. Loveless came with her parents from Colorado to Lake county, Oregon in the fall of 1890. Her father died on May 2, 1891, and then her mother returned to Kansas where she is now living. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Loveless, Emma, Mary and Ralph.

HERBERT E. REED is a well known farmer and stock raiser of Lake county and resides nine miles south of Paisley. His birth occurred on February 3, 1868, in the province of New Brunswick, Canada. His parents, George and Annie

Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Loveless

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Reed

James Foster

Mrs. James Foster

E. (Mitchell) Reed, are now living at Paisley, Oregon. Our subject came with his parents to Boston, Massachusetts, when a child and also resided in various parts of the east. Then they crossed the plains with ox teams from Iowa to Saguache county, Colorado, in 1874. Five years later, they removed to Wyoming and from that point journeyed to Ashland, Oregon, in 1886. It was 1889, when they came to this county and our subject soon filed on a preemption in the Goose Lake valley. Then he herded sheep and shortly afterwards in company with his father and brother, Walter F., engaged in the sheep business. Later, he and his father purchased a ranch which our subject now owns, being known as the Avery ranch, and it is one of the first locations in the Chewaucan valley. His house was the first lumber residence in this part of the country. In 1897, our subject bought his father's interest and since has added by purchase until the estate is six hundred and eighty acres, about one-fourth of which is very valuable agricultural land and the balance is pasture. Mr. Reed makes a specialty of raising hay, some alfalfa and handles cattle and horses. He has a good residence, plenty of barns, outbuildings and other improvements and is a prosperous man.

On November 17, 1895, Mr. Reed married Lucy J. Bryan, who was born in Yamhill county, Oregon. Her parents, Daniel Boone and Mary (Fairley) Bryan, are living in this county. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Reed are Rex E., Lester H., Lee R., and Ivan W.

JAMES FOSTER is one of the leading citizens of Lake county and is, as well, one of the earliest pioneers of the Summer Lake valley. His residence is eighteen miles northwest of Paisley on the west bank of Summer lake. He was born on July 4, 1827, in Coshocton county, Ohio. His father, Andrew Foster, who fought in the War of 1812, was a native of Virginia and a pioneer to the Willamette valley in 1845. He married Elizabeth Smith, a native of Ireland. They had a family of nine children and our subject is the only one now living. He crossed the plains with ox teams in 1845, the train coming via the Meek's cut off with Mr. Meek as guide. They came on to the Harney valley and later went where Corvallis is now situated in Benton county, Oregon. Previous to taking this trip across the plains, our subject migrated with his parents from Ohio to Missouri and from this latter place they started across the plains. His education was received in the various places where the family resided during his youthful days and in 1848, on November 30, he married Elizabeth Currier. She was born in Vermont, on June 18, 1832, and came to Missouri with her parents where they both died. She and her sister, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, came across the plains to Benton county in 1846. They came via the Goose Lake valley and Rogue river and were the first white women that went through the Cow Creek canyon. They crossed the Missouri river on May 10, arriving in Benton county on December 5. Our subject was engaged in farming and stock raising in the Willamette valley until the spring of 1871, when he moved to the Summer Lake valley, his present place. This has been his home since and for over a third of a century he has been one of the prominent and leading men of Lake county. Very few settlers were in the country when he came and he has seen it grow from the wild to its present state of development, having assisted materially in this transformation. Mr. Foster has always been on the frontier. Ohio was new when he was born there. Before it was much settled he was on the frontier in Missouri. Then they came to the Willamette valley and opened that country and afterwards he was one of the first settlers in Lake county. He has done a noble work as a pioneer, adventurer and frontiersman and is deserving of the esteem and respect which has been accorded to him. To Mr. and Mrs. Foster, the following named children have been born: Lorena, and J. Manley, deceased; John A. and James A., in this valley; Angeline, William H. and Annie E., deceased; Frederick W., of this valley; Marion L., deceased; Elizabeth F. Klippel, of this valley; Luvia S., deceased; Endora Hartin, of Tonopah, Nevada; Aurora A. Walters, of Spokane; Ralph C., of this valley; and Lulu Schminck, of Lakeview.

Mr. Foster has always been in the stock business since coming here and now owns a fine band of cattle. He also has one hundred and sixty acres of good hay land which is improved with a large twelve room residence, good stables, four acre orchard and everything needed in the carrying on of his business. He raises all kinds of fruit, as peaches, apricots, apples, pears, plums, prunes, berries, cherries and so forth. Formerly, he made a specialty of raising race horses and raised the noted Oregon Eclipse, which he took to various places in the west and also to Chicago. He sold him for seven thousand dollars. He owned his half brother, Hercules, who was also a well known horse.

SVANTE F. AHLSTROM is a native of Christianstadt, Sweden, and was born May 12, 1850. His father was John F. Ahlstrom and died at the age of seventy-seven. His grandfather, of the same name, was a soldier of Sweden, and lived to the age of ninety-nine years and nine months when he died from the effects of an accident. Mr. Ahlstrom's mother, Johannah (Waring) Ahlstrom, died in 1861.

In 1869 Mr. Ahlstrom went to Denmark, Germany, France and England, afterward coming to New York. From the latter state he came by the first overland train ever run over the Union and Central Pacific railroad from Omaha to San Francisco. He removed from San Francisco to Red Bluff, California, where he learned the saddler's trade, which he has followed as means of livelihood ever since. In 1873 he went to Marysville where he worked with H. M. Harris as a saddle and harness maker until 1886, when he formed a partnership with his employer and came to Lakeview. Here they engaged in business under the firm name of Harris & Ahlstrom, and continued in partnership until 1889, when Mr. Ahlstrom purchased the interests of Mr. Harris, since which time he has conducted the business independently. Fire destroyed his shop and the greater part of his stock in 1900, since which time Mr. Ahlstrom has erected a modern brick building on the site of the old. In addition to this building he owns a first class two-story residence in Lakeview.

Mr. Ahlstrom was married in 1876 to Mary Gunther, who was born in San Francisco and reared in Marysville, California. Her parents were Jacob J. and Sarah C. Gunther, natives of Germany and early pioneers of California.

To Mr. and Mrs. Ahlstrom have been born three children; Elmer C., a Lakeview merchant; Fred O., also a merchant and treasurer of Lake county; and Lottie Ahlstrom, bookkeeper for Ahlstrom Brothers.

Our subject was elected county treasurer on the Republican ticket in 1898; he has been school director for six years and has been a councilman and mayor of his home city. He has been a member of the Odd Fellows lodge for a period of thirty years, is now a member and past grand of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, is a past chief patriarch of Lakeview encampment, and has on different occasions represented his lodge in the conventions of the grand lodge. Both he and Mrs. Ahlstrom are members of the Rebekah degree, and he is also a charter member of the Foresters, of which order he has been chief ranger and is now district deputy.

Mr. Ahlstrom may feel justly proud of the business he has built up in his line since locating in Lakeview. He manufactures a special grade of saddle known as the "Lakeview saddle," the popularity of which has become so great during recent years that he ships great quantities of them to the states of Idaho, California, Nevada and the eastern states, besides the great number which find ready sale in his home state. Some have found a market in even as remote a locality as the Hawaiian islands. He also makes a specialty of manufacturing saddles and harness to order. From a beginning the most meagre his establishment has grown through the popularity of his goods into the most extensive plant of its nature in the state, outside the city of Portland.

EUGENE SPENCER EDE is proprietor of the hotel and livery barn at New Pine Creek, and is also proprietor of a flock of two thousand head of sheep. Born September 15, 1869, in Plumas county, California, Mr. Ede was the son of Abraham and Mary J. (Easton) Ede, the former a native of England. While a child of seven years Abraham Ede came to the United States with his parents and settled in Illinois, whence he crossed the plains to Plumas county, California, in 1851. Here he settled on a farm, where he lived until his death at the age of sixty-eight in 1900. The mother is still living in Plumas county.

The brothers and sisters of our subject are Walter, Mrs. Emma O'Conner, Edward J., Stephen, Mrs. Ida A. Anderson, and Albert A. Mr. Ede grew to manhood in Plumas county, California, where he received a thorough common school education, notwithstanding the fact that he was reared on a stock farm, and in September, 1894, came to Lakeview. Here he purchased four hundred head of sheep in partnership with his brother, Walter, and subsequently purchased his brother's interest. In 1897 he was indebted for more than the value of his property, but so skillfully did he conduct his affairs that two years later he was free from debt and in 1900 he had one thousand two hundred dollars in cash additional to an increased flock of sheep of about one thousand head. He has been successful in business ever since coming here. He continued to manage his sheep until during the fall of 1901, when he leased them to other parties and the following spring he purchased the hotel and stables at New Pine. He has recently built an addition to his hotel making it a three-story building containing twenty-five sleeping compartments, with office, dining room, kitchen and so forth. It is a strictly modern hostelry in every respect, located just thirty feet from the California state line. Mr. Ede also has his livery and feed stable well stocked and equipped.

On November 4, 1900, Mr. Ede was married to Iva D. Basey, daughter of John C. and Kate Basey. To this union two children have been born, Albert Irving and Edwin Leroy.

Mr. Ede is a member of Pine lodge, No. 48, A. O. U. W., of New Pine Creek, of which lodge he is also recorder, and both he and Mrs. Ede are members of the Degree of Honor, of Lakeview.

WILLIAM HARVEY has been a continuous resident of Lake county, Oregon, for the past thirty-two years, all of which time he has followed the sheep business, making him, by a wide margin, one of the pioneer wool-growers of the county.

Born August 21, 1845, in the northern part of Ireland, Mr. Harvey came to the United States and direct to California in 1870. He lived for a time at Tehama, California, and in August, 1872, came to Summer Lake valley, Lake county, Oregon,—at that time, however, Lake county was included in the county of Jackson. The nearest store to him was that at the Willow ranch, in Modoc county, California, distant seventy miles, and the nearest postoffice was at Hot Spring, fifty miles away. There were no roads nor public improvements of any sort in the valley, and at the time of Mr. Harvey's advent the valley contained only eleven inhabitants. Here our subject took a homestead and preemption, to make the required improvements upon which required his working for wages, and in 1875 he went to California and purchased a small flock of sheep. He brought his sheep to his Summer Lake valley ranch, and from year to year he has continued to add to the flock until he is now one of the wealthiest stockmen of the state. He owns two ranches containing about four thousand acres each, but his headquarters are at the Summer Lake ranch, which is situated at the southern border of Summer lake, about twelve miles west from Paisley. He has here one of the finest homes in Lake county, upon which he produces all varieties of fruit grown in this latitude and upon which he has the best of improvements. He also owns a handsome home in Lakeview.

Mr. Harvey was married during April, 1892, to Ruby Aitken, of Tehama, California. Two children have blessed this union: William Hamilton and Joseph Balentine.

SILAS J. STUDLEY is one of the large property owners of Lake county, his residence being ten miles south from Lakeview. He was born on March 17, 1844, in Walderboro, Lincoln county, Maine, the son of Thomas and Hannah (Gilchrist) Studley. The father was born while his parents were en route from England to the United States and the mother was born in Maine. They both remained there until their death. Our subject was well educated in the public schools of his native state and at the age of twenty, he came via New York and the Panama route to San Francisco. He at once engaged in mining then traveled to Yreka and afterwards to Aden, California. In the latter place, he did stock raising until 1869, when he assisted to drive the first cattle to the Big valley from Yreka. It was 1876 when he came to where Lakeview is now located and soon located a ranch about eight miles from that point. In the spring of 1881, he disposed of that and took land where he now resides. He has some thirteen hundred acres of land in three different tracts, each farm being well improved. The home place has a fine ten room residence, two good barns, and a large orchard of all kinds of fruit and is in a high state of cultivation. Mr. Studley has a nice band of cattle and much other property. He started in life without a dollar and has made by business tact and industry every dollar that he now possesses, which speaks very favorably of his business ability.

On September 11, 1873, Mr. Studley married Mary J. Stanley, who was born in Yreka, California, on June 16, 1855, the daughter of William and Johanna Stanley. The parents crossed the plains in 1853. To our subject and his wife eight children have been born, named as follows, Jerome, Harry, Bertha, May, Chester F., William Thomas, Alsy, and Oscar. Four of them are living at home but the first four, born are deceased.

LESLIE I. VANDERPOOL is a farmer and stockman of Lake county and resides five and one-half miles south of Lakeview. He was born on October 20, 1869, in Marion county, Oregon. James Vanderpool, his father, was born in Missouri and came west across the plains in 1851, using oxen for the teams. He located in Marion county, served all through the Rogue River War and died at Klamathton in 1899. He married Mary E. Miller, a native of Illinois, who took a trip across the plains in 1852. Her mother died while they were en route and thus bereft they made the last part of the journey. Settlement was made in Polk county when they arrived. Mrs. Vanderpool is now living in Prineville, where she has been for twenty-five years except the time when her husband was sick when they stayed at Klamathton. She has a nice property in Prineville and is living retired.

Our subject went with his parents to Prineville in 1875 and there was reared and received his education. When not in school, he was riding the range with his father and became thoroughly acquainted with the stock business. He has made two trips to Chicago with cattle and is one of the leading stockmen of this part of the state. The old home place lies six miles out from Prineville and consists of three hundred and sixty acres of choice agricultural land. Mr. Vanderpool is interested in stock raising where he resides and has a fine band of cattle and horses. He also owns a large band of horses in Crook county.

On December 1, 1902, Mr. Vanderpool married Edna R. Venator, who was born in Lake county, Oregon, the daughter of Jesse Venator. She owns a half interest in the Venator estate, where Mr. Vanderpool now resides and which estate he is managing. They are well-to-do people, have a good standing in the community and are reckoned among the leading citizens of the county.

CHARLES U. SNIDER. One of the earliest pioneers of Lake county, and one who, probably, has done a lion's share toward the upbuilding and development of the county and especially the city of Lakeview, where he now resides, is the man whose name forms the caption for this sketch. Mr. Snider came to Jackson county, now Lake county, March 12, 1869, and soon after his advent here he engaged in clerical work for his uncle, A. Snider, who conducted a merchandise store at Camp Warren. He began as bookkeeper but in the fall of the following year he assumed the management of a store, also belonging to his uncle at Camp Harney. Two years later he took charge of a store at Willow Ranch, in California, six miles from the Oregon line. In 1874 he formed a partnership with his uncle under the firm style of A. & C. U. Snider, and in April, 1876, built the first business house in Lakeview. In 1890 Mr. Snider was appointed by President Harrison to the position of receiver for the United States land office at Lakeview, which position he filled four years at that time, and on October 12, 1903, he received an appointment to the same office at the hands of President Roosevelt, so is now serving his second term. In politics Mr. Snider has from the first been a Republican. He cast his first presidential vote for General Grant and has voted the Republican ticket ever since. He has been continuously in the mercantile business until 1904. He has built and owned grist and saw-mills in different parts of the county, and has also been engaged more or less in the business of farming and stock raising. He has always been actively interested in the promotion of education and has ever been ready to donate substantial aid toward the erection of churches and all institutions making for the moral betterment of his community.

Charles U. Snider is a native of Shawneetown, Illinois, born March 20, 1846. His father was Joseph U. Snider, a native of Germany, who came to the United States at the age of eighteen years and located in Mansfield, Ohio. From that city he went to Shawneetown in 1842, and there died at the age of seventy-eight, in the year 1893. Margaret (Dorsey) Snider was our subject's mother. She was born in Hagerstown, Maryland and died in 1872.

Before coming west Mr. Snider received a common school education, and in 1862 he became a clerk on an Ohio river steamboat. In this capacity he worked until coming to Oregon. He returned to the east in 1876, and was there married, May 2 of that year, to Miss Mary E. McCallen, a daughter of Andrew and Mary A. (Castle) McCallen, of Shawneetown, Illinois. To this marriage five children have been born, two of whom died during infancy. The three now living are: Warner B., married to Frances Jones; Mae and Clarence U. The first named is now city recorder of Lakeview.

Mr. Snider is prominently identified with the fraternity interests of his city, being a member of the Blue lodge, A. F. and A. M., Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F., of which he is a past grand, and of the A. O. U. W.

He has a considerable amount of city property in Lakeview, including a brick and a frame store building and a first class home. He is one of the first pioneers of Lakeview, and is looked upon by the public generally as one of her first and best citizens.

STERLING P. VERNON was born in Crook county, Texas, on February 13, 1862, and now resides some three miles south of Lakeview, where he follows farming and stock raising. He has a choice ranch of two hundred and seventeen acres, mostly first class hay land. Owing to his thrift, industry and wisdom, he has gained a fine holding in property through his own labors here and is considered one of the substantial men of the county. His parents, Anderson P. and Dollie (Leathers) Vernon, journeyed to Benton county, Arkansas, when our subject was a young lad. In 1876, the family came to Surprise valley, California, and the following year, to Lake county. Thus they were among the early pioneers in this section of the country. They made location in the Goose Lake valley and selected a homestead. There were only two or three houses in Lakeview at that time and the entire country was very sparsely settled. Game of all kinds was in abundance on every hand and it seemed to be a veritable paradise for pioneers. Our subject, being of a studious turn of mind, gained an education although his opportunities were very limited. He accomplished this by studying much at home and in due time, he received a certificate and began teaching school. For three years, he followed this occupation and showed himself a thorough and first-class educator.

In 1892, on October 12, Mr. Vernon married Miss Effie Down, who was born in Sonoma county, California, the daughter of Albert S. and Carrie (Ballard) Down. To this happy marriage, six children have been born: Ralph, Willard, Dora, Vera, Frank and May. Vera is deceased.

Mr. Vernon is a member of the A. O. U. W. while he and his wife both belong to the Baptist church. They have been very active in church work and also constantly labor for the upbuilding of the cause and the spreading of the gospel. In addition to doing school teaching as mentioned above, Mr. Vernon has always been a warm advocate of educational advantages and has a strong record in that line. Besides the property mentioned, he owns a fine band of well bred cattle, has a good large barn, plenty of outbuildings and so forth and is one of the prosperous and well-to-do men of the county. He also owns two hundred and seventy-three acres of land six miles east from his home place which is utilized for pasture. When it is considered that Mr. Vernon started at twenty-one years of age without any means and has gained this fine list of property besides some more, entirely through his own efforts, we can well see that he is a man of energy and wisdom.

BERNARD DALY, M. D., is judge of the county court of Lake county and a prominent physician of Lakeview. His reputation as a practitioner, however, is not confined to his home city, but extends over the entire state of Oregon.

Dr. Daly was born February 17, 1858, in Ireland, and came to America when a boy, and it was in the United States that he obtained his excellent education. He was graduated from the Ohio state normal university, and later from the medical department of the University of Louisville, Kentucky. In 1887 he came to Lake county, Oregon, and has been successfully practicing medicine here continuously since. A lifelong Democrat, he was elected to the house of representatives of Oregon in June, 1892, and to the state senate on that ticket in 1896, serving four years. During his tenure in office his party was in the minority in the senate and Dr. Daly was one of the Democratic leaders throughout his term. In 1900 he was his party's candidate for Congress for the first judicial district, but was defeated in election after running ahead of his ticket by five thousand votes. Though Lake county was a Republican stronghold, Dr. Daly was elected, in 1902, by a flattering majority, to the office of county judge, which office he still holds.

During the past fifteen years he has been a member of the board of trustees of the Lakeview high school and has given marked attention to educational affairs in his county in general. He was one of the organizers of the Bank of Lakeview, instituted September 1, 1898, which is recognized as being the strongest bank in the state of Oregon south of Salem, having a paid up capital of ninety thousand dollars and a surplus of sixty-five thousand dollars. Our subject is now president of this bank. He was also one of the organizers and is president of the Lake County Land & Live Stock Company, incorporated, which has a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. He has been president during the past twelve years of the Lake County Agricultural society, instituted for the purpose of encouraging the agricultural and horticultural interests of Lake county.

Dr. Daly is a member of the American Medical association, and of the Oregon State Medical society, and maintains a high standing among his fellow practitioners throughout his state. He is a successful financier, not only in the management of his personal affairs, but those of the public, and since assuming the office of county judge he has been instrumental in freeing his county from debt without incurring additional burdens upon the tax-payers.

CHRISTOPHER WALTER DENT is county commissioner of Lake county, Oregon, and a wool grower and stockman residing in Warner valley. His postoffice address is Plush, Lake county, Oregon. He is a native of St. Francois county, Missouri, and was born June 18, 1863, the son of Flemmon and Adaline S. (Tullock) Dent. The father also was born in St. Francois county, where his father, grandfather of our subject, Absalom Dent, was a pioneer of 1815. The mother was a sister of William Tullock, one of the first settlers in Drew's valley, Oregon.

The brothers and sisters of Mr. Dent are:

William F., Big Springs, Texas; Mrs. Mary A. Waller, New Franklin, Missouri; Mrs. Lucy J. Sublette, Chico, California; Houston, Drew's Valley, Oregon; Albert, Lakeview, and Mrs. Rebecca E. Devine, Bismarck, Missouri. Another brother, John H., died in Warner valley in 1893.

Mr. Dent grew to manhood on a farm in his native state and started west August 22, 1885, arriving in Lakeview during September of that year and immediately engaged in herding sheep. In 1895 he purchased a flock of sheep and engaged in the sheep business for himself. He now has several thousand head of these animals, and a small herd of cattle. He has two ranches in Warner valley, one of which, contains two hundred and forty acres, including one hundred acres of alfalfa pasture, and the other, upon which he makes his home, is a natural meadow ranch, situated where old Camp Warner stood in early days. Both of these ranches are well improved. Mr. Dent also owns a handsome home in Lakeview.

In 1904 Mr. Dent was elected to the office of county commissioner for Lake county, on the Republican ticket, which office he is still holding. During the past twenty years he has been a member of the I. O. O. F. fraternity, and is now a member of Lakeview lodge and also of the encampment No. 18. He also belongs to the Rebekah degree.

On June 27, 1903, occurred the marriage of Mr. Dent and Mrs. Percy Benefield.

Mr. Dent is another example of the sturdy type of men who came to the west without means, and who, by their indomitable energy and perseverance, have striven against adversities and eventually became well-to-do and influential citizens. After many years of toil he took a vacation during the fall of 1898, going first to San Francisco, where he sailed for the Hawaiian islands. Returning, he visited Arizona, New Mexico, Texas and his old home in Missouri. He consumed four months on this tour and returned with the impression that Lake county was the best country he had seen and is now more content than ever before to spend the remaining years of his life here.

MARION S. BARNES. Lake county is well supplied with good mechanics and as a leader among the number stands the gentleman whose name initiates this sketch. He resides at Lakeview and in company with Eldon Woodcock, operates a large general blacksmith and wagon shop. They do all sorts of wagon work, horse shoeing and general mechanical work. They have a fine business and perhaps the best equipped shop in the county. This partnership was formed in February, 1904.

Marion S. Barnes was born on May 11, 1869, in Mono county, California, the son of James and Mary (Patterson) Barnes. The father was born in Iowa and served in Company H, Third Iowa Cavalry until he nearly lost his eyesight from exposure, being then discharged on account of this disability. In 1863, he started across the plains with wagons for California, making his first stop at Aurora, Nevada. They had considerable trouble with the Indians and at one time lost their entire band of stock, which, however, they recovered later. After some time in Nevada, he journeyed on to Mono county, California, where he followed freighting and the stock business until 1885. In that year, he came to the Goose Lake valley and settled at the Willow ranch just south of the state line, where he lived until 1893, the year of his death. His wife was also born in Iowa, crossing the plains with her husband and is now living with our subject. The children of this couple were Hiram, of New Pine Creek; William, of Silver Lake; Frank, of Summer Lake; Marion S., our subject; and Mrs. Emma Harris, deceased. Our subject grew up on a ranch received his education from the early schools and learned the blacksmith trade. He wrought at this in various vicinities, among which was Baker City, Oregon, and then he returned to this valley and opened a shop in Lakeview. Here he has continued uninterruptedly since, having gained a splendid patronage, owing to his skill and ability as a workman.

On December 17, 1888, Mr. Barnes married Stella C. Linville and to them three children have been born, Fay Lillian, Ralph Hobart, and Marvin James.

Mr. Barnes belongs to the A. O. U. W. and is a man of excellent standing in the community. Mrs. Barnes' parents are L. G. and Emmeline (Stevens) Linville, and reside in Lakeview. Mr. Linville is a native of Missouri and crossed the plains with ox teams as early as 1852. He settled in Lane county, Oregon, and in October, 1855, he volunteered to fight the Indians in the Rogue River War. He was in active service throughout the entire struggle and among other battles, participated in that of Risley's Ferry under Captain Miller, and in the fight at Hungry Hill. He also was in many other battles and skirmishes. He was in the mining camps in Yreka, California, and participated in quelling several uprisings in that state. In 1870 he came to Goose Lake valley and settled on the Modoc county side. He was among the first settlers in the valley and was one of the sturdy pioneers who assisted to open up and subdue this country. He and his wife have resided in Lakeview for the past fifteen years. He is aged seventy-two and his wife sixty-one. They are the parents of twelve children, eight of whom are now living and they are substantial and highly esteemed people.

WILLIAM HOLDER is now one of the thrifty tillers of the soil and lives in the vicinity of Paisley, Crook county, Oregon, his home being eleven miles south of that place. He was born on August 11, 1854, near Cornwall, Benton county, Oregon. His father, Adam Holder, was born in Pennsylvania, crossing the plains from Iowa in 1853 to Benton county and in 1859 settled in Corvallis, where he followed blacksmithing. In 1885, he came across the mountains to Sherman county where he is now living, aged eighty-two years. He married Julia A. Kompp, who was born on the Rhine, in Germany. She came to the United States when a girl and lived in Iowa where she was married. She is now seventy-two years of age and is still living. Her father, August Kompp, was an officer in the German army. Our subject has one brother, Lewis D., of Sherman county, Oregon, and one sister, Mrs. Pinkie Johnson, deceased. William was educated in the public schools and the agricultural college at Corvallis. In 1881 he went to Sherman county and engaged in farming. In 1894, he was elected sheriff of Sherman county, his name appearing on the Republican ticket and he was the first Republican sheriff of the county. So well did he fill the office that two years later he was chosen again to the same position and in 1898, the people determined to give him a third term and accordingly he was overwhelmingly elected. This gives him six years of continuous service in that important office and he left a record of uprightness and faithfulness seldom exceeded. In 1900, Mr. Holder went to Shaniko, where he operated a newspaper for a while, then he bought the Prineville Review and conducted it for a time. After that, we find him in charge of the Paisley Post and in the fall of 1903, he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of good land where he now resides, one-third of which is in cultivation and it is a splendid estate. It possesses some natural meadow, has an abundance of water for irrigation, has all the improvements and conveniences, as house, barn, orchard and so forth.

Mr. Holder has been twice married and has six children: Nellie, the wife of Erwin Pike of Sherman county; Minnie, wife of Prof. Frank Henry, of Moro, Oregon; Carl; Neva; Eulalia; and Thomas.

Mr. Holder is past grand of the I. O. O. F. and present noble grand. He is a member of the encampment, also of the W. W., the Maccabees and the K. P. He has been representative to the grand lodges of the I. O. O. F. and the Maccabees. He is a man of energy and intelligence, well informed on the questions of the day and a progressive, public minded citizen.

JOHN S. FIELD, of Lakeview, Lake county, Oregon, is a pioneer of 1879 and has passed through all the hardships and vicissitudes attending the life of the frontiersman. He was born December 28, 1856, in Pettis county, Missouri, in which state he grew to manhood. His parents both died during his childhood, so he had to shift for himself the greater portion of his life. He came to Susanville, California, in 1876, and, as has been stated, to this county three years later. Lakeview at that time was a mere hamlet containing only a few houses scattered about and was in a truly primitive state. Mr. Field adopted the life of the cowboy soon after coming to this state and for three years rode the range for various pioneer cattle men, after which he started the first meat market in the town of Lakeview. He later engaged in the general merchandise business, also following the business of sheep raising to a limited extent meanwhile. In 1900 his store was destroyed by fire, entailing a loss to its owner of eight thousand dollars. Mr. Field then erected a brick structure on the site of the burned building, which he later sold to the Odd Fellows lodge, and he now has under course of construction a two-story brick and stone building. He is at the present time engaged in the butcher business, but expects to re-enter the mercantile business upon the completion of his new block. He still has a flock of sheep and is doing a good business.

During the year 1886 Mr. Field was married to Cora Walters, daughter of Martin T. and Harriett Walters. In 1890 Mrs. Field died, leaving one child, a daughter named Oattie. Our subject was again married in 1901, his wife being Julia Robinson. This union has been blessed by two children, Neta and Opal.

Mrs. Field is a milliner by trade, and now conducts a millinery shop in Lakeview.

Mr. Field is a charter member of Lakeview lodge, I. O. O. F. In 1896 he was elected to the office of county treasurer, running on the Republican ticket, serving one term. He now devotes his entire time to his business.

Upon his arrival in the county Mr. Field had only twenty dollars in his possession, but he is now classed as one of the well-to-do men of Lake county, notwithstanding his great loss by fire only a few years ago. All that he has he has made by diligent application to business and untiring industry.

FRANKLIN O. BUNTING was born September 9, 1868, near Virginia City, Nevada, the son of Alexander J. and Mary M. (Schalk) Bunting. The father was born in Ohio and crossed the plains to California in 1852, and after residing short periods in different parts of the state removed to Virginia City, Nevada, where he engaged in the freighting business. From Virginia City he removed to Austin, Nevada, thence to Reno. From the latter city he at length returned to the state of California, founded the town of Buntingville and entered the general merchandise business. He came to Lake county, Oregon, in 1883 and located at Lakeview where he lived until 1900, when on account of failing health he went to San Francisco. He died in a hospital in that city at the age of seventy years. Our subject's mother was a native of Louisville, Kentucky, and emigrated to the west with her parents during the pioneer days.

The brothers and sisters of Mr. Bunting are: Charles A., of Merrill, Oregon; Mrs. Kate E. Hazelton, of Lakeview; and Edward R., of Reno.

When at the age of sixteen years, shortly after coming to Lake county, Mr. Bunting started in life for himself. He had no means, so in order to get a start, he worked for a time on salary for a stock man. In 1894 he took a contract to run a stage line between Lakeview and Paisley and Plush, the latter a small town in Lake county. Four years later he began running a stage from Lakeview to Alturas, California. This line he conducted until 1902, when he retired from the stage business. During the meantime he engaged in the stock raising business. In 1900 he went to Missouri and purchased a herd of pure bred Hereford cattle, ever since which time he has made a specialty of raising that particular strain of stock. He has the largest herd of pedigreed Hereford cattle in the state of Oregon, numbering two hundred and thirty head,—all pure bred Herefords. Of lands he has in all one thousand acres in Drew's valley twenty-three miles west from Lakeview, and a small hay ranch six miles southwest from Lakeview. All of his land is fenced and well improved, yielding him all the feed required for his stock. His large farm is known far and wide by the name of "The Bunting Stock Farm." In addition to this property Mr. Bunting has a modern home in Lakeview, where he spends the winter each year in order to give his children the benefit of the city schools, and the summer months are spent on the farm.

On December 9, 1897, occurred the marriage of Mr. Bunting and Miss Alice Rebecca Tullock, a native of Drew's valley, Lake county, Oregon. Mrs. Bunting's father and mother, William and Armona Rebecca (Chandler) Tullock were the first settlers in Drew's valley, where they followed the stock business during their residence there. The last ten years of their lives they spent in Lakeview. The father died in 1899 and the mother in 1898. Mrs. Bunting was their only child.

To Mr. and Mrs. Bunting have been born two children, Frederick Oscar and Ruby Armona, though they have another child, Elma Chandler by name, whom they are caring for as their own.

Mr. Bunting is one of the most prominent stock men in his state. He enjoys a wide circle of acquaintances and is a man of great popularity owing to his public spirit and his many acts of kindness and generosity. He is also a prominent Odd Fellow, being a member of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, of which he is a past grand. He is also a past chief patriarch of the encampment No. 18, of Oregon.

MARK E. MUSGRAVE is a farmer residing one and one-half miles south from Lakeview, Oregon, the Lakeview hot springs being on his farm. The springs mentioned have become a well-known health resort of Lake county, and since coming into possession of them Mr. Musgrave has spared neither money nor pains in placing them in condition to invite tourists and health seekers. The water of the springs contains sulphur, iron, borax and magnesia in considerable quantity and are at one hundred and seventy degrees in temperature. Mr. Musgrave has erected a building over them which building contains a swimming bath twenty-two by fifty-two by seven feet in dimensions. The waters have attained a wide reputation for their curative properties, and Lakeview Hot Springs are rapidly becoming one of the leading resorts in southern Oregon.

Mark E. Musgrave was born June 23, 1878, in Siskiyou county, California, the son of Mark and Lorinda (Burr) Musgrave, the former a native of Devonshire, England, and the latter of Ohio. The father, upon coming to the United States, settled in South Carolina, and in 1856 he crossed the plains to Yreka, California, where he engaged in mining. He is now living in San Jose. The mother, also living at San Jose, is the granddaughter of a cousin of Aaron Burr, of colonial fame.

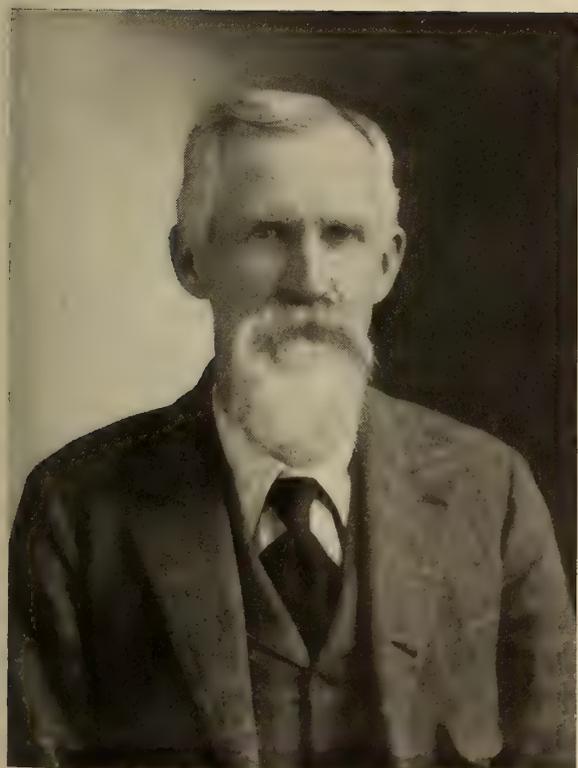

Our subject was reared in a mining camp in Siskiyou county until ten years of age, when he left home and went to work on a ranch, preferring ranch life to that in a mining camp. He soon went to San José, where he worked and attended school for a time, and later went to San Francisco, and there learned the wire-worker's trade. Later he learned to be a cook, and travelled extensively over the state working at the latter trade. He made several short voyages abroad coastwise steamers during his travels in California, and in 1897 he enlisted in the navy as a landsman aboard the United States coast defense monitor Monadnock, and while aboard that vessel he became familiar with all the ports along the Pacific coast from Mexico to British Columbia. During the war with Spain Mr. Musgrave was stationed on different vessels, the greater part of which time he was either first or second cook. He was aboard the "Mohegan" when she made a flying trip from Mare's Island with ammunition for Dewey's fleet before the battle of Manila. The Mohegan was met at Honolulu by the Baltimore which took the charge of ammunition to Dewey, who was then stationed at Hong Kong. Mr. Musgrave was one of the crew of the Mohegan which replaced the Hawaiian flag with that of the United States on August 12, 1898. He was also at Hilo, Hawaii, at the time of the recent great earthquake. On May 8, 1900, he was discharged from service. During his time of enlistment he had travelled pretty generally over the entire world and saw more sights than it is commonly given any one man to see.

Mr. Musgrave while in the navy, always received a good salary, and being saving with his money, he was enabled to start into business upon his discharge. He came to Lakeview in 1901, and engaged first as cook in the Lakeview hotel, but purchased his present home in May, 1902, and has resided here since that time. He has two hundred and ten acres of land, the major portion of which is first class hay and grain land, and well improved.

On March 16, 1902, Mr. Musgrave was married to Rose E. Rehart, a native of Modoc county, California. Her parents are Charles A. and Martha Rehart, sketches of whose lives appear elsewhere in this volume.

To Mr. and Mrs. Musgrave has been born one child, who is christened Charles Paul.

JOHN B. BLAIR, a prominent citizen of Lakeview and formerly county assessor of Lake county, is a native of Lee county, Iowa, born March 23, 1844. His father, Hon. Colbert P. Blair, was one of the earliest pioneers of southern Oregon, coming here with an ox train, of which he was captain, in the summer of 1853. He was a native of North Carolina, born January 1, 1805, and for the past fifteen years has made his home in Pendleton, Oregon. Although on the eve of his one hundredth year he is as hale and hearty as many men a quarter of a century his junior. He is a veteran of the Black Hawk and the Rogue River Indian wars, in both of which he saw active service as a scout and much severe fighting. After coming to Oregon he settled in Benton county, which county he at one time represented in the state legislature. Our subject's grandfather was Colbert Blair, a native of Scotland and a soldier during the Revolutionary War. Mr. Blair's mother was Elizabeth (Hill) Blair, also a native of South Carolina and of Scotch parentage, her father being Henry Hill. He, too, served in the Revolutionary War. The mother lived to the age of sixty-five years, when she died in Benton county, Oregon.

The brothers and sisters of John B. Blair are: Thomas J., Pendleton; James H., and Mrs. Meeky Trapp, both of Lincoln county, Oregon. One brother, Oliver P. Blair and four sisters, Mrs. Fanny Scovel, Mrs. Cloe Jane Skipton, Mrs. Sophia Irwin, and Martha B. Blair, are dead.

Mr. Blair crossed the plains with his father and family, the family at that time consisting of the parents and eight children, and assisted his father in opening a ranch in the wild and unsettled prairie in Benton county, Oregon. Opportunities for attending school were at that time decidedly meagre, but notwithstanding that fact our subject managed to obtain a fair common school education by applying himself to study at home. He was married during August of 1867 to Jennie Fuller, and in the spring of 1872 he came to the Chewaucan valley, now Lake county, but at that time Jackson county, Oregon. The valley at that time contained only five settlers and was not improved even by as much as a public road. The following spring he went to Summer lake valley and took a preemption and worked for wages in order to make improvements on his ranch. Later he traded his claim for cattle and engaged in the stock business. Returning to the Chewaucan valley, he took a homestead, upon which he made his home until 1901. In 1900 he was elected to the office of county assessor and two years later he was elected to succeed himself. He was elected on the Republican ticket, and was the first man in the county to be elected to the office of assessor a second time. He removed to Lakeview in 1901, where he has since made his home. He is one of the most highly respected citizens of Lake county, where he is universally regarded as a man of ability and of honor. As an example of the trust reposed in him by his fellow citizens we may mention the fact that he is at the present time executor for two estates, the testator in each instance appointing him with the request that he perform the duties of the position without being placed under bonds.

Mr. Blair has been a member of Lakeview lodge, I. O. O. F., for twenty-five years, that being the only secret order with which he is affiliated.

To Mr. and Mrs. Blair, five children have been born: Wellington S., married to Birdie McDonald and residing at Paisley, Oregon; Dollie Viola, deceased; Tracy C.; Richard, deceased; and Dovie Maria, the wife of James Reeder, of Silver Lake, Oregon. Wellington and Birdie Blair have three children. Tracy C. Blair, the second son mentioned, is married to Annie Miller and has one child. He is a surveyor and civil engineer of prominence in Anaconda, Montana. He has been a surveyor on the Great Northern railroad for three years, and is now in the employ of the Anaconda Copper Company for which he engineered the flume and great smoke-stack at Anaconda.

It is pleasant to state that since the above was written, our subject went to Pendleton, Oregon, and there, January 1, 1905, with other members of the family, celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of his father's birth, Hon. Colbert P. Blair.

HENRY R. HERYFORD, one of the early pioneers of the territory now embraced in Lake county and a steady laborer here for the upbuilding and improvement of the country since those early days, is now residing a mile and one-half north of Lakeview, where he owns six hundred acres of choice farming land. He was born on July 29, 1850, in Knox county, Missouri, the son of Clemens R. and Nancy (Chambers) Heryford, natives of Missouri and Ohio, respectively. The mother is now deceased and the father is living retired in Santa Rosa, California, in his eighty-fourth year. The children born to this venerable couple are William P., in Lakeview; Mrs. Sarah Hunt, of Shasta county, California; Henry R., who is our subject; John M., of Shasta county, California; James D., of Lakeview; Thomas J., of Shasta county, California; and Aaron M., of that same county. Our subject crossed the plains with his parents in 1857, being in an ox team train. They made their way to Shasta county, California, where the father engaged in farming. There the father remained until 1900, when he moved to Santa Rosa, California, as stated above. On July 3, 1872, our subject, then being a young man of twenty-two, came to the portion of Oregon now occupied by Lake county. His two brothers, William P. and James D., accompanied him and they camped where Lakeview now stands and well remember that the rye grass was higher than their heads. On July 4 of that year, they settled on the north end of the valley and entered into partnership in the stock business. This continued until 1896, when our subject sold his interest. Since that time, he has been operating alone and in addition to the fine estate that we have mentioned, he owns one hundred and sixty acres of timberland. His residence is a large twelve room structure provided with all conveniences, while the other improvements of the place are equally as good. His farm is supplied with plenty of water and among the various springs are some boiling hot.

On August 12, 1877, Mr. Heryford married Mary L. Parker, who was born in Iowa, the daughter of Robert L. and Ellen (Conger) Parker. In 1875, they journeyed from Iowa to Oregon and now live in Jackson county of this state. To our subject and his wife, eight children have been born, named as follows: Nellie, wife of Fred Ahlstrom; Lem, who married Selma Averiganett; Ollie E., wife of A. H. Hamersley; Harry; Fred; Willard; Hazel; and Hildred. Fred is deceased, and Mrs. Hamersley died March 4, 1905.

Mr. Heryford is a member of the I. O. O. F., being past grand of the order. He is also past chief patriarch of the encampment and is a popular man in fraternal circles. In addition to general farming, Mr. Heryford gives considerable attention to handling stock, the same consisting of well bred horses and cattle. He is to be classed among the earliest pioneers of this section and for over thirty years, he has labored assiduously for the upbuilding of the country with a measure of success that has placed him not only in possession of a large amount of property but as one of the leading citizens of this part of the state who enjoys the esteem and confidence of his fellow men.

GEORGE REED, a carpenter and cabinet maker of Paisley, is one of the leading men of this part of the county and is doing a fine business. He has a large shop, well fitted and supplied with everything necessary to do first-class work in the lines mentioned. He has a gasoline engine which operates circular, groove, rabbit, scroll, and other saws and planes, while also he has a first class lathe. Mr. Reed is a mechanic of no small ability and is able to do first class building and also other lines of carpenter work.

He has been especially successful in this line and is a very valuable man for the county as there is much to do still in building up and improving this fertile section.

George Reed was born on December 15, 1839, near Fredericton, New Brunswick. His father, Joseph Reed, was a native of the same place and his father, Benjamin Reed, the grandfather of our subject, was born in New York and was a sea captain. The mother of our subject was Abigail (Jewett) Reed, born in the same place as her husband, and her father, Daniel Jewett, a native of the same place as his daughter, was a miller. Our subject's parents both died in New Brunswick. They had a family of fourteen children, twelve of whom lived to be grown and nine of whom are now living. After securing a good education, George was apprenticed to a first-class carpenter and served four years in that capacity, during the latter portion of which he received twelve and one-half cents per day as compensation. In 1865, he went to Concord, Massachusetts, where he worked at his trade for a year and one-half. Then he returned to New Brunswick and in 1867, married Annie E. Mitchell, a native of New Brunswick. It was with her father, James Mitchell, a native of Glasgow, Scotland, that our subject learned his trade. Mrs. Reed's mother was Fanny (Heustis) Mitchell, also a native of New Brunswick. Following his marriage, Mr. Reed returned to Concord, Massachusetts, and worked for the same firm he had been with before. For the last two years, he was foreman in their carpenter shop. Following this service, he went to South Dakota and dwelt just across the line from Iowa. He wrought in Akron, Iowa, erecting the first hotel and various other buildings there. His son, Walter F., was the first white child born in that town and one of the streets was named for Mr. Reed. After three years in that section, Mr. Reed moved his family to San Luis valley, Colorado, the date then being 1875. He assisted in the organization of Gunnison county there in 1876 and was the first county commissioner. In 1878, he moved to the head waters of the Tongue river in Wyoming and located a ranch that is now part of the townsite of Sheridan. He was one of the very first settlers in that vicinity and engaged in the stock business. There was a large quantity of game of all kinds such as deer, elk, buffalo, antelope, and so forth, and Mr. Reed greatly enjoyed hunting. So sparsely settled was the country that whenever one discerned a moving object, he could be reasonably sure that it was a wild animal or an Indian. In the fall of 1886, Mr. Reed removed with his family to Ashland, Oregon, and in the spring of 1888, he came to the Goose Lake valley. After that, he returned to Eugene, Oregon, and the fall of 1890, he came to the Chewaucan valley and there was engaged in the stock business with his sons. After they were married, he sold out and came to Paisley where he opened a shop that he now is operating. In addition to doing general building, he makes a specialty of the manufacture of furniture, which finds a ready sale through the country. He has a good residence and some other property and is a member of the I. O. O. F. For two years, Mr. Reed served as deputy sheriff of this county and was a capable and efficient officer. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Reed are Herbert E., in New Brunswick and now a stockman near Paisley; Walter F., born in Akron, Iowa, and now living at Bly; and Maude E., born in Colorado and now the wife of John McCormack, of California.

JOHN N. WATSON is register of the United States land office and a prominent wool grower residing in Lakeview, Oregon. He was reared on a farm in Montgomery county, Illinois, and upon the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted in Company F, One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Illinois Infantry, being a member of the first regiment which was a part of Kimball's provisional division attached to the Sixteenth corps. He joined the army in August, 1862, and was given an honorable discharge in August, 1865. During his term of enlistment he was in many of the prominent battles and in numerous minor fights and skirmishes, prominent among which we may mention the siege of Vicksburg and the battle of Little Rock. He is now a member of the Gen. O. M. Mitchell post, G. A. R., of Reno, Nevada.

After the war Mr. Watson returned to Illinois and in 1866 he went to Labette county, Kansas, in fact, prior to the organization of that county, as he was one of its organizers and was elected its first sheriff. In 1875 he came to Portland, Oregon, and the year following to Chico, California, where he engaged in the stock business and freighting. He went to San Francisco in 1884 and there engaged in the business of buying stock for a number of the prominent wholesale meat markets of that city. In 1891 he came to Lake county in the interest of his firms and seven years later he came to locate here, though he still continues to buy stock for the San Francisco markets. He engaged in the sheep business upon coming to this county and rapidly increased his holdings in sheep and land until he now has a large flock of sheep and four hundred acres of choice land in Lake county. He was appointed register of the United States land office during October, 1903. He always has been an uncompromising Republican in politics. He was made a Mason in November, 1868, and is now a member of the Paisley lodge of that order.

Mr. Watson is classed as one of the well-to-do citizens of Lake county, although he started in business here with very small means. He is a man of great energy and perseverance and of strict honor, traits to which is wholly due the success he has made of his life.

John N. Watson was born in Scott county, Illinois, January 3, 1843, the son of James C. Watson, a native of Ohio, and Serena (Thomas) Watson, whose native state is New York. He was married in May, 1868, to Malissa Craft, in Chetopa, Kansas. Mrs. Watson died in April, 1882, at Chico, California, leaving three children, whose names follow: Bertha, wife of Robert S. Boyd; Maud, wife of Robert W. Gray; and Benjamin C. Watson, married to Irene Lutgen. All of the children are residents of San Francisco.

In December, 1904, Mr. Watson married Mrs. Cornelia (Barnard) Knox, the daughter of James E. and Luemma Barnard, at Lakeview, Oregon.

The birth of Mr. Farra occurred on September 6, 1861, in Jackson county, Kansas, his parents being David R. and Mary (Rice) Farra, natives of Kentucky, and South Carolina, respectively. He secured his education in the various places where he dwelt during his boyhood days and was reared on a farm. In the spring of 1880, he came to Silver Lake in this county and began to work for wages on a stock ranch. Later, he went to Goose Lake Valley and was foreman on the X. L. ranch for over five years. Then he engaged in the stock business for himself and removed to the Chewaucan valley. This was about 1887. He purchased a ranch and continued steadily in stock raising until 1897, when he engaged in the livery business at Paisley. His two ranches of over five hundred and fifty acres in the valley, are operated by tenants. He personally handles the livery barn and oversees the ranches, and the handling of the stock which consists of about two hundred head of cattle. The ranches are mostly hay land and are valuable. The entire property that Mr. Farra now owns has been gained by him since coming to this county, as he started entirely without means. In addition to what has been mentioned, he has a good residence in Paisley and some other property.

Fraternally, Mr. Farra is affiliated with the A. F. & A. M. and the Eastern Star.

In 1883 our subject came to his present locality, and the following year he went to Goose Lake valley, where he followed working for various stock men for a means of livelihood. In 1886 he engaged in the sheep business on his own account and has followed that industry continuously from that date. Mr. Turpen is a member of the Lakeview lodge of Foresters of America.

He is one of Lakeview's substantial citizens and business men.

GEORGE CONN is one of the wealthy citizens of Lake county and stands at the head of several important enterprises. His birth occurred on January 31, 1840, in Cass county, Indiana. His father, Henry Conn, was born October 12, 1816, in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, and descended from an old American family, many of whom were in the various colonial struggles and especially in the Revolution. He came west to Hamilton county, Ohio in 1837, then was in Cass county, Indiana, about 1839, and in 1854, crossed the plains to Roseburg, Oregon, with teams. He took a donation claim near Roseburg and there remained until his death in May, 1896. He had married Miss Mary J. Stultz, who was born in Hamilton county, Ohio. She died on the old donation claim in 1898. Her birth had occurred on April 24, 1821. They were the parents of eleven children, nine boys and two girls and nine of the number are now living. Our subject accompanied his parents on their journey to the west and received his education from the common schools, finishing in the Willamette University at Salem. Then he taught school for a time and in 1862 was on the crest of the wave that rolled into the Salmon river mining country. He traveled all through that section, through the Grande Ronde valley and the Walla Walla country, also visiting Florence and many other mining places, as Boise and Canyon City. He was at the last place in 1862. In March, 1865, he enlisted in Company A, First Oregon Volunteer Cavalry, and went as escort to the parties locating the military road across the state. After that, he was at Fort Klamath, then went to Vancouver, where he was mustered out in March, 1866. In May, 1872, he was appointed the receiver at the United States Land Office at Linkville and five years later the office was removed to Lakeview, where he continued until January, 1882, making ten years in that capacity. In 1880, he opened a general merchandise establishment in Lakeview and in September, 1881, he moved his stock of goods to Paisley, where he has continued steadily since. He now has a large stock of goods and does an extensive business. In 1886, Mr. Conn erected a fine roller flouring mill of fifty barrel capacity, which property he still owns. He has a fine eight room residence with some eight hundred fruit trees on the grounds. Mr. Conn has made a splendid success in raising fruit of all kinds and such vegetables as tomatoes and so forth. He has about eight hundred acres in his ranch, six hundred of which are tillable. About ninety acres are producing alfalfa and he also has some natural meadow on the estate. Mr. Conn has quite a bunch of stock and altogether is one of the most prosperous and wealthy men in this part of the country.

On February 27, 1887, Mr. Conn married Miss Margaret Sergent, who was born in the Rogue river valley in this state. Her parents are Conrad S. and Loetta (Hauck) Sergent and are now living in Jackson county, Oregon, having been pioneers of the state in 1861. Mr. Conn came to this country without means and by his own efforts unaided, he has made his splendid success in the business world which he enjoys today.

DANIEL BOONE was born December 28, 1842, in Lincoln county, Tennessee, the son of William and Sarah (Howard) Boone, both of English descent and the former a native of North Carolina. The father was a soldier in the War of 1812, and, although still almost a boy, was with General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. William Boone was a son of Benjamin Boone, who was the son of John Boone, the latter being a brother of Squire Boone, the father of Daniel Boone, the famous Kentucky pathfinder. This branch of the family is descended from George Boone, who came from England and who was an early pioneer of Pennsylvania.

Daniel Boone grew to manhood on a farm in his native state, and at the age of sixteen was graduated from the Darnell College, of Marshall county, Tennessee. At the age of seventeen he went to Washington county, Arkansas, and on May 27, 1861, enlisted in the confederate army under General McCullough. He was the youngest member of Company I, but was soon made captain of his company. He served in Arkansas until the battle of Elkhorn, or Pea Ridge, when his company was transferred to Corinth, Mississippi. Captain Boone participated in the battles of Iuka, Corinth and the siege of Port Hudson, as well as numerous skirmishes, and was finally returned to Arkansas. He was involved in the battle of Prairie Grove, in the latter state, and later was again sent to Mississippi. He was under General Dick Taylor against General Banks in the Red River campaign, during which he was in two hardly contested battles. Returning again to Arkansas, Mr. Boone fought his last battle with General Price at Saline river. During his military service Mr. Boone was wounded numerous times though, fortunately, never very seriously, and his army record is one of bravery and attention to duty.

Following the war our subject taught school for three years in Washington county, Arkansas. He was married June 24, 1868, to Millie Dodson, also a native of Tennessee. He was a merchant and farmer in Washington county for sixteen years, and then brought his family to Modoc county, California, mainly for the benefit of his own and his family's health, which was very poor in their home state. They arrived in the Surprise valley, California, in the spring of 1884, but soon afterward Mr. Boone came on to Big valley, Lake county, Oregon, and purchased land. He was joined by his family in 1890. He was engaged in the cattle and mule raising business for a number of years in Warner valley, and in 1898 he gave his land and stock to his son and he accepted the position of postmaster at Plush. Here he also started a small store, which he managed in connection with the postoffice, and before many years he had a stock of general merchandise on hand and was doing a good and profitable business. He has recently sold out his store at Plush, but expects soon to engage in business at Lakeview.

Mr. and Mrs. Boone have been parents of nine children, as follows: Erin and Veva, who fell victims of scarlet fever in the Surprise valley, California; Dr. Eugene D. Boone, a graduate from the Missouri Medical College, and now a practicing physician and surgeon at Caldwell, Idaho; J. Early, E. Marvin and George P. Boone, partners in the stock business in Warner valley, Oregon; Mirth and Mayfield Boone.

WILLIAM JOHN SHERLOCK is one of the prominent wool growers in Lake county and has won his way to the front by virtue of his hard labor and wisdom. He resides in Paisley, where he has a good dwelling and from which he handles his stock interests in other parts of the country. William J. Sherlock was born in Bandon, county of Cork, Ireland, the son of Thomas and Elizabeth Sherlock, the date of this event being June 3, 1863. After studying in the common schools until fourteen, he went to sea as an apprentice and rose from that position to second mate of a fine craft. For ten years Mr. Sherlock sailed and visited almost all the principal ports of the world, being acquainted with many peoples and their ways. Afterwards, he came to the United States in 1888 and in June of the same year, landed in the valley where Paisley is now located. His brother, Thomas, was here before and together they labored in the sheep business until finally,

Mr. Sherlock decided to go into business for himself. He has a good ranch, several thousand sheep, comfortable residence and other property.

In February, 1883, Mr. Sherlock married Miss Lucy Austin, who was born in Ireland. Their wedding occurred in London, England. Mrs. Sherlock's parents are William and Jane (Barrett) Austin, natives of Ireland. The father was a manufacturer in London and is now deceased. The mother is living in Clonkilly, county of Cork, Ireland. To Mr. and Mrs. Sherlock, four children have been born: Thomas Austin, William John, now in the county of Cork, Ireland; Richard Flemming and Walter Alexander in the civil service in South Africa.

MANLEY CROMWELL CURRIER, who resides in Paisley, Oregon, was born on July 6, 1856, in Benton county, Oregon. His father, Jacob Manley Currier, was born in Vermont, February 12, 1827, and crossed the plains from the state of Missouri in 1846 to Oregon, taking a donation claim near where Corvallis is now located. He served among the volunteers in the Cayuse Indian war and of the Rogue river war and is still living on the old donation claim near Corvallis, in his seventy-ninth year. He married Maria Foster, who came across the plains in 1845 to what is now Benton county. She is now deceased. Our subject has one brother, William A., of this county and one sister, Mrs. Laurena Belknap of King county, California. Our subject grew to manhood in Benton county and there secured his education. In the fall of 1880, he came to Summer Lake in this county and engaged in the stock business. In 1896, he sold out and located in Paisley and two years later opened up a retail liquor store. He has a prosperous business and owns a good residence in town.

Fraternally, Mr. Currier is affiliated with the I. O. O. F.

On November 11, 1903, Mr. Currier married Kittie Bell Hanan, who was born in Lake county, Oregon, near Summer Lake valley. Her father was John C. Hanan and her mother Margaret E. (Hadley) Hanan. John C. was born on February 29, 1844, at Oregon City and as far as is known, was the first white child born in the territory now embraced in the state of Oregon. His father, George W. Hanan, had come to the Willamette valley in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company as a shoemaker. John C. Hanan came to Lake county in 1875 and was married in the Chewaucan valley to Margaret E. Hadley, who died in 1902. They were the parents of eight children, George, Mrs. Emma Kelsay, Mrs. Currier, Charles M., Henry E., Andrew, John and Waymen.

Mr. and Mrs. Currier are well known as are also Mr. and Mrs. Hanan, having been pioneers in this county.

JOHN ALLEN WITHERS, deceased. It is very fitting that in a volume which purports to speak of the early pioneers and prominent citizens of Lake county, we should incorporate an epitome of the life of John A. Withers, for he certainly was one of the leading men of this part of the county and was beloved and esteemed by all who know him. The old home place is about nine miles northwest from Paisley where his son, Charles W. Withers, resides at the present time.

John A. Withers was born on May 1, 1854, in Benton county, Oregon. His father, Peter Withers, married Effie A. Early and they crossed the plains from Missouri to Oregon in every early days and are now living in Lane county. Our subject was the oldest of the family and the other children are Peter, of Lane county; Mrs. Mary Hadley, of Lane county; and Mrs. Ada Roberts, of Prescott, Arizona. Our subject grew up with his parents and received as good an education as the pioneer country would afford. Then in 1871, he came to Summer Lake and soon after located a homestead. He engaged in the stock business and on May 10, 1875, married Melvina Frances Hadley who was born in Shasta county, California. Her father, Samuel B. Hadley, crossed the plains from the state of Illinois to Oregon in the early forties and was about the first settler where the city of Portland now stands. Later, he went to Douglas county and took a donation claim being one of the first settlers in that county. After that, he journeyed to Shasta county, California, and returned to Douglas county and then came to Summer Lake valley in this county. This was in 1871 and he was one of the very first settlers here. He made this his home until his death in 1891. He married Emily A. Hammond, who accompanied him across the plains and died in Douglas county in 1886. The brothers and sisters of Mrs. Withers are Albert H., deceased; Mrs. Margaret L. Hannan, deceased; S. G., of Silver lake; Melvina F., who is the wife of our subject, and Melville F., twins, the latter in Lincoln county, Washington; John T., deceased; Mrs. Kitty E. Currier of Summer lake; and Henry M. of Fruitland, Washington. To Mr. and Mrs. Withers, two children were born, Chester Lawrence, who married Melva Lewis and is now in the general merchandise business in Paisley; and Charles Wayman, who married Lottie D.

Harris. He was formerly in partnership with his brother in the store but sold out and bought the old home ranch which consists of one thousand acres of hay and pasture land. It has all conveniences, good house, barn and orchard, and is one of the choice places of the country. Mr. Withers has quite a band of sheep and also raises cattle and horses. To him and his wife, two children have been born, Muriel Frances and Vancil Allen. The sons of Mr. Withers are both members of the I. O. O. F. He gave them both a college education in Portland and San Francisco. On March 27, 1902, Mr. Withers died from the effects of smallpox. His death was most sincerely mourned as he was one of the leading and good men of the country. His circle of friendship was as wide as his acquaintance and he was looked up to and respected by everybody. He was a prominent citizen and devoted and faithful husband and a kind and generous neighbor. He was always ready to assist in every movement for the upbuilding of the country and no unfortunate person ever appealed to him for help without receiving the same.

ALVA L. HOWELL was born in Michigan, January 23, 1850, the son of William H. and Ellen (Hackett) Howell, and at an early age crossed the plains by ox team with his parents to Oroville, California. Later the family settled in Sutro county, of the same state, where, for a number of years they lived on a farm. They then went to Petaluma county, California, then to Colusa county, and lastly to Tulare county, where the father died. The mother died in Colusa county.

The son then came to Lake county, Oregon, in June, 1878, and engaged in the stock business in Goose lake valley. Lakeview, at that time, was a very small village, with only a handful of inhabitants and there were but few families living in the valley of which we speak. Mr. Howell continued in the cattle business here until 1901, when he disposed of his cattle to engage in the sheep business, which he now follows successfully. He has a stock ranch near Lakeview, and quite a large flock of sheep. He also has a residence in Lakeview, where he makes his home.

Mr. Howell was married in 1889 to Alice McGarey, a native of Shasta county, California. She died in 1898, leaving one child, Bessie Clarey Howell, who is now attending school in Shasta county. Mr. and Mrs. Howell were parents of four children in all, three of whom died in infancy.

Mr. Howell is a member of Lakeview lodge,

1. O. O. F. and of the Lakeview encampment, No. 18.

Alva L. Howell came to this county with limited means and has seen, perhaps, more than one man's just share of hardships and sorrows. He has been energetic and persevering, however, and is now realizing the fruits of his labor, being one of the popular and prosperous citizens of Lakeview.

CHARLES A. REHART is a wool grower residing in Lakeview, Oregon. He was born in Perry county, Ohio, November 24, 1852, and in 1863 he went with his parents to Keokuk county, Iowa. Three years later he crossed the plains with his father, Joseph Rehart, to Marion county, Oregon, and in 1868 they removed to California, since which time they have lived in different parts of California, Colorado, and Oregon. Our subject came to Lake county in 1883 and engaged in the sheep business, which he has continued to follow successfully ever since. Twelve miles north from Lakeview, on Crooked creek, he has eighteen hundred acres of land, two hundred acres of which are meadow land and well improved. In 1899 Mr. Rehart removed to his present home in Lakeview, where he has a two story, nine room house and twenty acres of highly improved land adjoining the city. He now owns several thousand head of sheep, and some cattle and horses.

He is a member of the Woodmen of the World fraternity, and one of the prominent citizens of his city.

Mr. Rehart has been twice married—the first time to Martha A. Brooks, in Modoc county, California. By this union seven children were born, Ella A., Rose R., William J., Edna, Artie, Roy and Benjamin. Mrs. Rehart died in 1889, since which time our subject was married to Mrs. Clara (Wright) Simpson. This marriage has been blessed with six children: Mildred, Katren, Marie, Georgie, Ruby and Ethel.

Mr. Rehart's second wife was a widow at the time of her marriage to Mr. Rehart, and was the mother of two children, Myrtle and Nellie Simpson. These children were very small at the time of their mother's second marriage, and are being raised by Mr. Rehart, making in all fifteen children in the family, all of whom are still at home.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS CANNON is certainly to be classed with the leading pioneers and substantial citizens of Lake county. He now resides at New Pine Creek where he has a fine estate and does general farming and stock raising. He was born on February 11, 1842, in Holt county, Missouri, the son of George W. and Mary A. Cannon. The father died in the Goose Lake valley aged eighty-three and the mother died here at the age of eighty. They have been members of the Methodist church for over sixty years. In 1853, the family came across the plains with ox teams the father being captain of the train. On the 30th day of May in that year, they crossed the Missouri river and on October 26th of the same year they landed on Salt creek in Polk county, Oregon, where Mrs. Cannon's father, William Robinson, was living. He had come across the plains in 1847. In 1854, Mr. Cannon removed to the Umpqua valley and there built a mill which was burned down during the Rogue river war. In 1861, our subject began prospecting in the promising fields of western Oregon, Idaho and Washington and was well acquainted with all the leading camps. Then he returned to Lane county whither his parents had come and in 1869 he came to the Goose Lake valley, locating at the mouth of Lassen creek. He built his cabin on June 14, 1869 and is supposed to be the only man now living here that helped to celebrate the 4th of July in that year. In 1871, the parents came and remained here until their death. Our subject hired to a Mr. Snyder to operate a sawmill and for seven years labored in that capacity, receiving as wages, one hundred dollars per month. Then he engaged in farming and stock raising and several years ago sold his ranch in Lassen creek. He now has about three hundred acres of fine land adjoining the town of New Pine Creek, part of which is located on his land. His farm is all under cultivation, has three fine dwellings and three good barns, besides many other improvements and is one of the valuable estates of the county.

In 1887, Mr. Cannon married Miss Blanche Follette, the daughter of Captain E. and Christina Follette. They formerly came from Iowa to California and then settled in this country, being now residents of New Pine Creek. Mr. and Mrs. Cannon have one child, Olive Blanche. Mr. Cannon and his wife and daughter are all members of the Methodist church and are highly respected people. As early as fifteen years of age, our subject started out for himself and has made his entire holding by reason of his industry and thrift. He had the privilege of assisting to care for his parents in their declining years and was very faithful in all his duties. It is very interesting to know that when Mr. Cannon first came here, he was considerable of a nimrod and had great experiences in slaying elk, deer, bear, cougar and so forth. He has met and slaughtered many of the genuine grizzly and has had some very narrow escapes. On one occasion, he was very nearly killed by a cougar but he always managed to find a way out and generally brought trophies of slaughtered game.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH RANDOM is proprietor of the hotel Paisley, in Paisley, where he is doing a good business. He makes a genial and first class host and he has so conducted his hotel as to make it a favorite with the traveling public. In addition to this he oversees his estate lying near Paisley, which is one of value. Mr. Random was born on March 5, 1856, in Portland, Oregon, being thus one of the natives of the Webfoot State, where he has been engaged most of his life. Robert E. Random, his father, was born in Maryland and in 1851 came across the plains, settling in Portland where he engaged in the mercantile business until 1859, the year of his death. Our subject's mother, Elizabeth (Lambert) Random, was born in England and came to the United States when a child. In 1850, she accompanied her parents across the plains to Portland where her father, Noah Lambert, was a well-to-do contractor and builder. He acquired a good fortune there and died in 1901, being ninety-three years of age. Mrs. Random is now living in Red Bluff, California. Our subject went to Yreka, California with his mother at the age of six and received his education in the common schools of Yreka, California. In 1880, he came to Lake county and for a time labored in the Goose Lake valley. After that, we find him in the vicinity of Summer Lake where he rode the range for some time. Afterward, he came to the Chewaucan valley and secured a farm of one hundred and forty acres, which lies about a mile southeast from Paisley. It is all good creek land and is supplied with comfortable house, barn and improvements and is one of the very productive farms of the county. Mr. Random also raises stock.

On Thanksgiving day, in 1885, Mr. Random married Harriett L. Bagley, who was born in Siskiyou county, California and the daughter of John and Lucretia (Millsap) Bagley, the former of whom is deceased. The family crossed the plains from Arkansas to the Willamette valley, then went to Siskiyou county and about twenty years ago, settled in the Chewaucan valley. To Mr. and Mrs. Random, two children have been born, Virril Lambert and Verda Wanneta.

Mr. Random is one of the well known citizens of the county and has done much pioneer work here. His portrait is found on another page in this volume.

RHESA A. HAWKINS, of the firm of Hawkins and Rinehart, is one of the leading business men of the county. Mr. Rinehart is now sheriff of Lake county and the firm conducts a large sawmilling business, while also they own a ranch and buy and sell stock. Mr. Hawkins resides in Crooked creek valley, Lake county, sixteen miles north of Lakeview. He was born in the Shenandoah valley, Virginia, on July 15, 1857, the son of Rhesa and Eliza (Crabill) Hawkins, natives of Virginia. He was the youngest of a family of nine children and his parents both died in Virginia when he was a small boy. Thus he was early called to meet the responsibilities and hardships of life and he got his education as best he could, growing up amid these adversities. In 1878, he determined to try his fortune in the west and although he was without means, he succeeded in borrowing enough to pay his way to the Surprise valley, California. The next year, 1879, he came on to Goose Lake valley and worked in a sawmill for Mr. Russell for three years. He not only was enabled to pay up all his debts but by economy and thrift saved some. Then he returned to Surprise valley and engaged with his brother, John Hawkins, in a flour mill at Cedarville, California. Two years later, he sold out to his brother, who is still operating the mill. He returned to Lakeview in 1887 and bought a half interest in a sawmill near where his mill is now located. His partner sold out to Elmer E. Rinehart and together Messrs. Rinehart and Hawkins have operated the business since. They do an extensive business and are well known and thoroughly reliable men.

On November 26, 1887, Mr. Hawkins married Lena Best, the daughter of John C. and Anetta Best. She was born in Missouri and came with her parents to California in early days. Soon they moved to Lakeview, where they reside at the present time. Our subject, as stated before, began early in life to do for himself and by his labors and careful management has come to be one of the well-to-do and leading citizens of Lake county. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., the encampment and the A. O. U. W. Personally, he is a sociable, kindly man, has many friends and is one of the active elements in the upbuilding of the country.

JOHN D. VENATOR is a prominent attorney at law residing in Lakeview. He is a native of Lake county, born July 5, 1873, on the old Venator homestead five and one-half miles south from Lakeview. His father was Jezereal Venator, a native of Tennessee, who came to Illinois at the age of nineteen years and crossed the plains in 1852 to the vicinity of Albany, Oregon. Here Jezereal Venator took a donation claim, where he made his home until the outbreak of the Rogue River Indian war. He was actively engaged, and was wounded in this war. He came to Goose Lake valley in the fall of 1870 and located the ranch now known as the "Old Venator ranch" mentioned above, which was the first ranch located in what is now Lake county. This place was originally filed upon by a man named Crane, from whom Crane creek derived its name, who sold it to a Mr. Moon, who erected upon it a log cabin which was the first house built in the county, and which was only recently razed. Mr. Moon sold his claim to Mr. Venator, who engaged in the stock business and lived on the homestead until his death at the age of sixty-four years. Just prior to his death Mr. Venator, senior, started to Harney county on business and it is the supposition that he became lost in the desert and perished for the want of water. His remains were found in a canyon, which has since taken the name of Venator canyon. The mother of our subject, Eliza (Miller) Venator, was born and reared in Illinois. She crossed the plains with her husband, and is now living on the old homestead, aged seventy-two years. Our subject is the youngest of a family of nine children. His brothers and sisters are, Ira K., Mrs. Mary Cooksey, Al, Ulyssus G., Frederick, and Mrs. Edna R. Wanderpool; two of the children being dead.

Mr. Venator was given a common school education while living on the old homestead, after which he took a four-year course in the law department of Ann Arbor, being graduated in 1901. He was admitted to the bar of the states of Michigan, Ohio and Indiana, while in the east, and upon his return was admitted to the Oregon state bar in November, 1901. In each of the states named he is entitled to practice before the supreme court. He has been engaged in the practice of his profession ever since his return to Lakeview.

Mr. Venator is a member and past grand of Lakeview lodge, No. 63, I. O. O. F., of the Lakeview encampment and of the Rebekah degree.

He owns one-half interest in the old homestead, which consists altogether of three hundred and sixty acres of the choicest land in Goose Lake valley. The farm is well improved in every particular, and is irrigated by a ditch leading from Crane creek. It is regarded as being the best ranch of its number of acres in the valley. Mr. Venator also owns cattle and horses.

FRANCIS M. CHRISMAN is one of the best known business men in Lake county. He personally supervises his diversified interests in such a manner that he has won a splendid success in every line. Without doubt an account of his life will be very interesting to everybody.

Francis M. Chrisman was born in Lane county, Oregon, on October 29, 1865. His father, Peter G. Chrisman, better known as "Major" Chrisman, a native of Illinois, crossed the plains to Oregon in 1851. He came west with his father, Campbell E. Chrisman, who was the grandfather of our subject. Major Chrisman was one of the sturdy and leading pioneers of the Willamette valley and in 1874, came to Silver Lake, being among the first settlers of this section. He occupied himself with the stock business until 1882, when he sold out and was a moving spirit in the organization of the Lakeview Bank. For eleven years he was president of that institution and then retired from active life. For a time he dwelt in California and now is residing in Baker City, Oregon. He married Nancy Porter, who crossed the plains from Illinois to Oregon about the same time as her husband. She is now living with her husband in Baker City. They were the parents of four children: Francis M., who is our subject; Mrs. Amanda J. Moore of Baker City; Rhoda and Wiley A., deceased. After studying in the public schools, our subject took a three years' course in the state university at Eugene. He had come with his parents to Silver Lake in 1874 and after returning here from his school work, he engaged in the stock business. Later, he sold these interests and went into partnership with J. H. Clayton in general merchandising, the firm being known as F. M. Chrisman and Company. This was in 1890. Two years later Mr. Chrisman's brother purchased the interest held by Mr. Clayton and the firm was changed to Chrisman Brothers. Owing to the failure of his brother's health, Mr. Chrisman purchased his brother's interest and has since conducted the establishment alone. His brother died in 1895. Mr. Chrisman has a fine large store building, forty-four by sixty, two stories high with two store rooms below, and the upper apartments, which are all well fitted with a first class assortment of general merchandise. He carries everything in the line of dry goods, notions, groceries, crockery, clothing, boots and shoes, hardware, farm implements and so forth. Mr. Chrisman is a very progressive and energetic man and is also a skillful buyer. Thus he is enabled to keep his store replenished and thoroughly up-to-date. It is the second best stock of goods in Lake county. The store building is supplied with a fine fire proof safety deposit vault which is first class in every respect. Since 1891, Mr. Chrisman has been postmaster at Silver Lake and is now also notary public. In addition to this, he handles the hotel Chrisman, the leading hotel in Silver Lake, which is a fine, up-to-date hostelry. This thriving hotel business is practically under Mrs. Chrisman's management. Nearby, Mr. Chrisman has a comfortable dwelling, besides other property in the village. He owns one hundred and sixty acres of first class farming land. He is vice president of the Lakeview Telephone and Telegraph Company and is among the largest stockholders. He also owns town property in Silver Lake. Thus it is seen that in the business world, Mr. Chrisman is one of the leading men of this part of Oregon. His ability and integrity as a business man is first-class and his standing in the community is of the very best. Mr. Chrisman has so handled his large interests that everything from the minutest detail to the general management is conducted on sound business principles with a wisdom and an energy that is bringing success in every department.

Fraternally, he is associated with the Masonic lodge at Eugene, Oregon. Mr. Chrisman has always been very active in educational work and is a moving spirit for the betterment of facilities in this line constantly. He is a public minded man, generous and always ready to assist every movement for the benefit of the community. In church matters, Mr. Chrisman has always donated liberally and is an ardent supporter of the gospel.

On September 28, 1888, Francis M. Chrisman married Juda E. Robinett, who was born in Lane county, Oregon. Her father, James Robinett, was born in Boone county, Missouri, and crossed the plains from Buchanan, Missouri, to Clackamas county, Oregon, in 1847. Later, he removed to Linn county, then to Lane county, where he remained until his death in 1896, being then in his sixty-fourth year. He married Jennie Shields, a native of Clark county, Illinois, who journeyed with her parents to Buchanan county, Missouri, and there attended the same school as did her husband. She crossed the plains in 1851 with her parents to Linn county, Oregon, where she was married on November 27, 1851. She is now making her home in Silver Lake. Mr. and Mrs. Chrisman have one daughter, Vida R. Mr. Chrisman and his wife and her mother all belong to the Baptist church as also did Mr. Robinett before his death. In addition to the other enterprises mentioned, we note that the public telephone is in Mr. Chrisman's office.

Mr. Chrisman was owner of the goods in the storerooms of the building which burned on the night of December 24, 1894, in which terrible conflagration sixteen men, sixteen women, and eight children lost their lives, and which is fully detailed in another portion of this work. Immediately upon receipt of the news of the fire in San Francisco, Mr. Chrisman's creditors garnisheed such an amount of his insurance as would cover their accounts, and telegraphed to the Portland creditors that a balance of insurance was available to apply on their accounts. Let it be remembered that so terrible was the catastrophe that the whole country was dazed at the appalling loss of life and property, and scores of homes were draped in mourning for loved ones. Every effort was being put forth to rescue the remains of the unfortunates, and Mr. Chrisman, with others, was wholly occupied in looking after the injured and rescuing the remains of the dead. At such a time, the harsh act of the San Francisco men tell heavy. However, some men were found in Portland who had enough of the milk of human kindness and honor to reply to the unwarranted advances of the San Francisco men by wiring back that F. W. Chrisman would pay every cent of his obligations without such harsh actions in the time of such deep sorrow. And he did—paid every cent, but we can well understand how differently he feels toward the two set of creditors.

Hon. Campbell E. Chrisman was a member of the Oregon legislature in early days and was a man who succeeded in life well, not only in financial lines, but in leaving a testimony for right and integrity. He stood above reproach and his advice and counsel was sought by all who knew him. He died in 1884, at Cottage Grove, Oregon.

G. R. Chrisman, who is an uncle of our subject, is county judge of Lane county and interested in the First National Bank in Eugene.

It is interesting to note that P. G. Chrisman, our subject's father, built a log cabin on Silver creek, hired a teacher and had school for six months for his and the neighbors' children, this being the first school on the creek. He was very liberal in his dealings, was highly thought of by his neighbors, who had the utmost confidence both in his integrity and his ability to handle finances. Even in the stringent times of 1892, and thereabouts, while he was president of the Lakeview bank, they all counted on his ability to carry the institution through safely, which he did.

FELIX DORRIS DUNCAN should be named among the early pioneers of the country now embraced in Lake county. He resides some eight miles southeast of Silver Lake postoffice on the west bank of Silver Lake and there owns a nice home place besides two hundred acres at the foot of the lake. He gives his attention largely to stock raising and has some very choice Durham cattle and Norfolk horses. He takes great pride in raising first-class stock and always has fine animals. Mr. Duncan started without capital wneater and has gained the property that he now owns through his own efforts entirely.

Felix D. Duncan was born on March 26, 1858, in Lane county, Oregon, the son of George C. and Louise (Rinehart) Duncan. They crossed the plains from Iowa in 1854 and made settlement in Lane county. In 1873 they came to Silver Lake valley, where the father is now living. The mother is deceased. Mrs. Duncan's mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Rinehart, died in February, 1903, aged ninety-seven. Our subject grew up in Lane county and there received his education. When the family came on to Silver Lake valley, he accompanied them and here rode the range and took his present place as a homestead. He has been laboring steadily since in stock raising and farming and has a very good holding in property at this time. Fraternally, Mr. Duncan is affiliated with the W. W. and in 1898, he was elected assessor of Lake county on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Duncan was among the first ones of the early settlers to come to this valley. Those who located in the Silver Lake valley in 1873, were Charles P. Marshall, James Sullivan, Emery Noble, George Thompson, Albert Rose, A. V. Lane, Samuel Smith, A. R. Chase, Mr. Murdock and G. C. Duncan and family. Mr. Marshall, Mr. Sullivan and the Duncan family are the only ones of the entire number that still remain. Mrs. Duncan, Mrs. Murdock and A. V. Lane's mother were the only women that wintered here in 1873. Our subject has assisted materially in the transformation of the country from the wild to its present prosperous condition and has always been a good substantial citizen.

ALVIN N. BENNETT is a prosperous wool grower residing one mile south of Warner Lake postoffice, in south Warner valley. He is a native of Waldo county, Maine, born March 18, 1846. His father, Morton Bennett, and his mother, Sarah (Martin) Bennett, were also natives of the Pine Tree State. The father was of English ancestry.

At the age of fourteen young Bennett went to sea aboard a man-of-war, upon which he served for three years, during which time his vessel was engaged in the attack on Fort Sumter. Later he shipped on a merchantman, serving nine years. While aboard this vessel Mr. Bennett saw the greater portion of the civilized world and touched on many of the South Sea islands. In 1870 he went to Nevada, with the intention of remaining there, but the longing for the sea was irresistible and he soon returned to the life of a sailor. Three years later, however, he came to California and engaged in mining in that state and Nevada until 1877, when he came to Fort Bidwell. In 1885 he settled in Warner valley, Lake county, Oregon, where he was one of the first settlers in the country. He came into possession of land in south Warner valley and is today the only one of the first eight settlers to locate here, all of whom came at the same time. He first engaged in the business of raising horses, later disposed of his horses and entered the cattle business, and lastly, in 1897, he engaged in his present business, that of raising sheep. He owns a flock of several thousand sheep, and has a choice hay ranch of one hundred and sixty acres where he makes his home. His land is well improved, as to buildings, fencing, and so forth, and is all under irrigation ditch, making it one of the most desirable farms in the county. He also owns several hundred acres of grazing land.

On July 22, 1883, Mr. Bennett was married to Miss Jennie Morrow, born in the Sacramento valley, California. Mrs. Bennett's father was Joseph L. and her mother Sibbrina (Ahart) Morrow, pioneers of California.

To Mr. and Mrs. Bennett have been born two children: Lenora E., now the wife of Irvin Wakefield, of Warner valley; and Joseph M. Bennett. Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield have one child, a daughter, named Daisy Wakefield.

Although Mr. Bennett came to Lake county with limited means, and had a hard struggle for existence for some years after locating in Warner valley, he has made a success of his business and today is in circumstances commonly classified as "well-to-do."

JOHN PRADER, a farmer of Lake county, resides a mile and one-half southeast from Summer Lake postoffice. He was born on August 24, 1855, in Switzerland, the son of John L. and Verona Prader, also natives of that same country. The father is now dwelling in North Dakota. The mother died before the family left Switzerland and the father married a second time. Our subject has three sisters, Mrs. Elizabeth Guler, in the Willamette valley, Anna, of North Dakota, and Maria, deceased. He also has the following named half brothers: Andrew, in Spokane; Peter and J. Lucius and Lawrence of North Dakota. Our subject received his education in the old country and there remained until 1873, when he journeyed to the United States. He first sought a location in Sauk county, Wisconsin, and then went to North Dakota and assisted to organize a county. After that, he traveled to various portions of the United States a great deal and finally in 1888, came to Crook county and there remained seven years. After that, he traveled again and finally in 1898, he located in Lake county securing his present place of one-half section. It is a good farm, mostly all tillable land and is well improved with barns and other equipments. Mr. Prader gives his attention to raising hay and doing general farming. In this line he has been very successful and is one of the substantial men of the county.

Mr. Prader has three children, Rena, John and Walter. Mr. Prader is a member of the W. W. and when in North Dakota was commissioner of his county. He always takes a lively interest in political matters and is a warm advocate of general progress and better educational advantages.

FREDERICK WARNER FOSTER has one of the most beautiful places in Lake county. It consists of six hundred and sixty acres of farm land and lies on the west bank of Summer lake, about a quarter of a mile north from Summer Lake postoffice. The farm is well improved with a fine residence, good barn and other outbuildings and is productive of large returns in grain, timothy, alfalfa, red top, natural meadow hay, besides also a first class orchard which contains every variety of fruit grown in this latitude. Mr. Foster also raises a large amount of first class vegetables and has an abundance of tomatoes, potatoes, corn, watermelons and so forth. He started in life without any means and has gained this fine property by his own efforts unaided. He raises some stock, horses and cattle, and altogether is one of the rich and prosperous men of this portion of the state.

Frederick W. Foster was born in Benton county, Oregon, on March 11, 1862, the son of James and Elizabeth (Currier) Foster. He grew up with his parents on the farm and received his education in the home place. In the fall of 1872, the family came to this county and our subject the next year began to ride the range. When he was of age, he located a homestead five miles south from where he lives at present and began stock raising and farming. He improved his ranch in fine shape and in 1897 sold it. Then he purchased the estate which he now owns and where he has made his home since. The farm is laid out wisely and extends for a mile and a quarter along the lake beach and is an ideal place. A magnificent grove of poplar and locusts beautify the residence site and everything indicates a taste and thrift which are very becoming.

The main county road runs right by his house and Mr. Foster certainly has an ideal home. He takes especial pains in raising blooded stock and has a fine band of registered Shorthorn animals.

On May 28, 1887, Mr. Foster married Ada McDowell, who was born in Iron county, Missouri, the daughter of John and Flavia (Harris) McDowell. The father died in Missouri and the mother came across the plains with Mrs. Foster and another daughter about twenty years ago. The other daughter is now Mrs. Ava M. Barnes. To Mr. and Mrs. Foster, four children have been born: James Guy, Ruby Faltel, Carmel and Harold Neal.

Mr. Foster is a man who always takes a keen interest in the progress and upbuilding of the community and has ever labored ardently for the betterment of educational facilities. He is giving his children a thorough education at the Corvallis institution. Mr. Foster believes in thorough education and is a very progressive and up-to-date man.

JAMES N. GIVAN. Born April 13, 1862, in Keokuk county, Iowa, James N. Givan is now a prominent stock raiser residing one mile south from Adel postoffice, in Lake county, Oregon.

His father, Henry C. Givan, is a native of Indiana and a veteran of the Civil war, and his mother is Phoebe E. (Jacobs) Givan, both of whom are now living at Fort Bidwell, California.

In 1871 our subject came with his parents to Surprise valley, California, in what is now Modoc county, and eight years later came to Warner valley, Oregon. Here he worked for a salary on the "J. J." ranch for a period of twenty-one years, the last ten years of which time he was foreman of the ranch. In 1899 he purchased his present ranch and two years later he engaged in the sheep and cattle business. In 1902 he sold his cattle and for a time was exclusively a sheep raiser, but later he disposed of his sheep and bought cattle so that now he has a large herd of the latter and is doing a prosperous business. Where he lives, Mr. Givan has two hundred and twenty acres of land, the greater portion of which is adapted to the raising of hay, and eighty acres of which is seeded to alfalfa. He can irrigate the most of his land from an irrigation ditch leading from Deep creek, and his home is well improved with good dwelling and outbuildings, a first-class orchard, shade trees, and so forth.

Mr. Givan was married to Mrs. Dora E. Overton, December 6, 1890, which union has been blessed with three children, Earnest Truman, Hazel Olive and Dallas Gordon.

The only secret society to which Mr. Givan belongs is the Odd Fellows, he being a member of Lakeview lodge, No. 63. He was one of the early settlers of the valley and when he came here all that was his in the way of worldly goods was a saddle pony and saddle. He was industrious and saved his earnings until he could get a small start in the stock business, after which time skilled management and good business judgment have brought him ample returns and he is now one of Lake county's substantial stockmen.

He graduated from the high school in Lakeview when seventeen years of age and two years previous to that had secured a certificate to teach school. However, he never engaged in that business but when nineteen bought a few cattle and commenced stock raising, in which he has continued since. In 1903, he purchased sheep and now has about two thousand head and is giving his attention largely to wool growing. He has quite a large band of thoroughbred Durham cattle and also owns nine hundred and twenty acres of land, at the home place, which is practically all suited to raising hay. In the orchard, besides other varieties of fruit that can be grown in this latitude, Mr. McCormack has planted some English walnuts, which are doing very fine at this time. He also owns four other ranches in different parts of the county, which are utilized for grazing purposes.

On October 25, 1899, Mr. McCormack married Frances Uren, who was born in Wisner, Nebraska. Her father, William Uren, married Frances J. Ivey and both are natives of England. W. and is a staunch Republican. He is a well informed man, a good citizen and highly esteemed by all.

JAMES M. SMALL, who resides some two and one-half miles east of Silver Lake, was born on July 27, 1850, in Pettis county, Missouri, the son of George and Malinda (Hinch) Small. In 1853, the family crossed the plains with ox teams from Missouri to Lane county, Oregon, where the father took a donation claim. That was their home until 1860, when they journeyed on down to Glenn county, California, and there the father died the next year. Our subject gained his education in the various places where the family lived during his youth, and as early as 1873 made his way into the Chewaucan valley, arriving here in May of that year. The mother came into the valley in the same year and they were among the very earliest settlers in the country. In 1880, she journeyed to Lane county, Oregon, and there died four years later. Our subject met the various adversities and hardships incident to pioneer life and took hold with a will and very soon had land opened up and a good band of cattle on the range. In 1886, he journeyed from his first location to the Silver Lake country and here has been raising cattle and sheep since. He now has disposed of his sheep and handles cattle and horses, having a nice stock of each. He has been well prospered in his work and is among the substantial men of this part of the country.

On December 12, 1880, Mr. Small married Maude Brattain, who was born in Lane county, Oregon, the daughter of Thomas J. and Permelia J. Brattain. Mrs. Small's parents crossed the plains from Iowa to Oregon in 1850 and were among the early pioneers in Klamath county. Later they returned to the Willamette valley and in 1873 came on to the Chewaucan valley, where they are now residing. To Mr. and Mrs. Small, three children have been born: Belle, the wife of Ernest Carlson of Summer Lake; Robert, who was burned to death in the Silver Lake fire on December 24, 1894; and Ross. Mr. Small owns about two thousand two hundred acres of land in Lake and Klamath counties, five hundred of which are utilized for hay. The home place is well improved with house, good barn and other equipment and he is considered one of the prosperous and leading men of the country.

ELMER D. LUTZ is one of the industrious farmers and stockmen of Lake county and resides about a mile north of Silver Lake, where he has one of the best farms in the county. It consists of two hundred and forty acres of first class soil, well adapted to the production of all kinds of grain, fruits and vegetables usually grown in this latitude. The place is well improved and kept in a good state of cultivation and Mr. Lutz is considered one of the thrifty and substantial men of this county.

Elmer D. Lutz was born on February 7, 1864, in Forest Grove, Iowa. His father, Charles Lutz, was born in Pennsylvania and was an early pioneer in Iowa. He was in that state when the Sioux Indians were on the war path and was exposed to much danger and hardship. He married Martha Long and they are now living in Whatcom, Washington. The brothers and sisters of our subject are Albert J., on the police force of Whatcom; Mrs. Irene Boyd; Charles B.; John L.; Walter A., a druggist; and Mary; deceased. Those living are dwelling in Whatcom. Our subject was the third child in the family and from the time he was twelve years of age, has been doing for himself. He has met with much adversity and has seen a great deal of hard labor but has always been possessed of sufficient grit and force to overcome. His education was secured in the various places where he lived during his boyhood days and when the family journeyed to South Dakota, he went with them. In 1866, he came to California, settling in Shasta county and a year later journeyed thence to Silver Lake valley, landing here in May, 1887. He first took a preemption but was beat out of that owing to the swamp act. However, he succeeded in getting a clear title to the place. Silver Creek runs through the land and he irrigates portions of the farm from it. His ranch is very productive and in addition to handling that, Mr. Lutz raises cattle and horses and is prospered in his labors. He had no means and everything that he now owns has been gained by his labors and careful management here. Mr. Lutz stands well in the community and always takes a keen interest in educational matters and politics and everything that tends to build up the country.

WILLIAM D. WEST, the efficient assessor of Lake county, resides about two and one-half miles northwest of Silver Lake. He was born on November 13, 1859, in Waseca county, Minnesota. His father, Hiram West, was a native of New York state and an early pioneer of Waseca county, Minnesota, and was there during the terrible Sioux uprising in early days. He was auditor of Waseca county for several years and died in 1864. He had married Susan Bailey, also a native of New York state and who died in Sierra county, California, in 1882. Besides our subject, one other child was born to this marriage, Ward R., who now resides in Modoc county, California.

Our subject crossed the plains to Sierra county, California, with his mother in 1870. His education was received in the public schools and in 1883, we find him in Modoc county, California. In the spring of the next year he came on to the Silver Lake valley and rode the range here for several years. Finally, he took a homestead where he now resides and engaged in raising horses. He has a band of horses at this time, owns one hundred and sixty acres of meadow land which is well improved with house, barn and so forth, and is one of the prosperous men of this part of the county. He is deserving of the success he has attained and is the recipient of the good will and esteem of all.

WILLIAM H. McCALL is a wool grower residing two miles east and two miles north of Silver Lake. He was born on April 2, 1855, in Lane county, Oregon. His father, William McCALL, was a native of Tennessee and journeyed to Illinois whence he crossed the plains with ox teams to Lane county, Oregon, being one of the earliest settlers in that section. He located a donation claim and remained on the same until his death. He was an elder in the Christian church and an exemplary man. His birth occurred in 1815 and his death in 1877. He was of Scotch-Irish extraction and married Matilda Markley, a native of Ohio, who accompanied her husband across the plains. She was born in 1820, and is now living in Eugene, Oregon, being of German ancestors. Our subject grew up in his native country and secured his education there. In 1873, he made the first trip to Silver Lake valley with stock. From that time until he came here to reside in 1877 he visited this country each year, but made his residence in Lane county. When he finally removed here, he took up land near his present home and at once went to riding the range. He had a family, a wife and five children, and was practically without means, so that he knew well the hardships incident to pioneer life. For three years, Mr. McCALL was foreman of the G. S. S. ranch. In 1897, he engaged in the sheep business and now has a fine band of sheep and twelve hundred acres of land, over half of which produces hay. He also has taken up ten acres under the Saline Act. On this tract, there is a lake of about five acres which is fed by salt springs that come up in and around the same. There is a very large per centage of salt in this water with a very little soda. It is located about ten miles northeast of Silver Lake postoffice in what is known as the desert and some years many tons of salt are formed by evaporation of the water. Mr. McCALL expects to put in an evaporating plant and produce salt for the market shortly.

On November 28, 1875, Mr. McCALL married Cynthia I. Miller, a native of Yamhill county, Oregon. Her father, Alexious N. Miller, was a native of Missouri and crossed the plains in 1847 to this state. He settled in Yamhill county and afterwards in Lane county, where he lived until his death at Pleasant Hill. The same occurred on November 11, 1902, he being then seventy-nine years of age. He married Jane Hutchinson, who was born in Missouri. Her parents came from Kentucky and she came west a few years after her husband, the marriage occurring in Oregon. Mr. McCALL has the following named brothers and sisters, James, John A., Henry D., Lorenzo D., Adin J., deceased, Mrs. Elizabeth Rowland, Mrs. Martha Bristow, Mrs. Ella Bridges, Mrs. Emma Miller, and Catherine, deceased. Mrs. McCALL's mother was a great niece of Chief Justice Marshall. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. McCALL are named as follows: Olo J., the wife of Marion Conley of Paisley; Claude M., Adin N., Ira C., Virgil, Henry, Robert M.

CHARLES P. MARSHALL is one of the early pioneers of the Silver Lake valley, where he now resides some five miles northeast of the lake. He has labored here assiduously for over a quarter of a century and deserves to be classed with the builders of the country. He was born on January 19, 1834, in England, the son of Nicholas and Mary A. Marshall. He came with his parents to the United States in 1839 and lived in Pennsylvania, where he engaged in the coal mines as soon as he had arrived at sufficient age. He secured his education "between times" when a boy and in 1846, went aboard a man of war at New York city. He was in the merchant marine and has been at the various leading ports of the world. He circumnavigated the globe and was on the sea in all some ten years. At the time he quit, he was first mate of the good craft Aquilla, which was later sunk in San Francisco bay. In 1856, he quit the sea at San Francisco and devoted his attention to mining until 1869 when he journeyed to Modoc county and settled at farming in the Big valley. There he raised stock and tilled the soil until July, 1873, when he came to Silver Lake valley. He was one of the very first men to settle here and since that time has continued here steadily except two years spent in Albany, this state. When he located, he had some stock and has continued in that business together with farming since. In those early days to run to the postoffice was no slight job as it was one hundred miles distant. All kinds of supplies had to be brought in over rough mountain roads with great expense and labor. Nevertheless Mr. Marshall continued his good work here and has not only done well in building up but has stimulated others by his industry and thrift.

On February 22, 1887, Mr. Marshall married Mrs. Frances A. (Brown) Anderson, a native of Missouri. Her father, Milton Brown, crossed the plains from Missouri in 1846 and settled at Oregon City, being one of the earliest pioneers of that vicinity. He was also one of the first settlers of the Summer Lake valley and came to Silver Lake where he engaged in the mercantile business. His death occurred here on November 18, 1904, he being then in his ninetieth year. He was one of the substantial and good men of this county, well known and beloved by all. He was faithful in labor, upright and honorable in business and a genuine good citizen and a first-class man. He married Christian Farris, who is also deceased. By her former marriage, Mrs. Marshall had three children: Ida, the wife of John Hill in The Dalles; Mary, the wife of F. M. Taylor, of Benton county; and Anna C., the wife of William Hough of Silver Lake, all in this state. Mr. Marshall formerly operated the hotel at Silver Lake but now is giving his entire attention to his stock business and farming. Mr. and Mrs. Marshall are people of good standing and have many friends throughout the country. They have certainly done an excellent work as pioneers and deserve to be classed with those who have made the country what it is.

PART VIII

HISTORY OF KLAMATH COUNTY

FROM EARLIEST DAYS UNTIL SETTLEMENTS OF 1867

Klamath county came into existence as a separate political division in 1882. Prior to that period, although it had before been a part of Wasco, Jackson and Lake counties, respectively, the territory that now comprises it was known as the "Lake Country," or the "Klamath Country." The history of the Klamath country dates from many years before the formation of this county and even prior to the advent of its first settlers.

This country was inhabited by the Klamath and Modoc Indians when the first small, crawling wave of immigration curled over the bunch grass plains and through the foothills and mountain peaks—ever onward to the settlements west of the mountains. And this had been the Indians' home for centuries. The Klamath Indians, then known as the La Lakes, inhabited that district of the country—the vicinage of Big Klamath lake, and north of Klamath, and west of Link rivers. They were strange, uncanny tribes; their very language was peculiar to themselves while they, at the same time, also understood the universal "jargon."

The Modocs inhabited the country south of Little Klamath lake, and around Tule lake, east of Goose Nest Mountain, and west of Goose lake. They, also, conversed in a language common only to themselves and the Klamaths. In reality they were only one people. There was only a slight difference in the pronunciation of a few of their words, yet no greater difference than there is in the speech of northern and southern white people. They were friendly tribes; they intermarried. It has been written and published in histories that the Klamaths and Modocs were hereditary enemies. This is not so. At all times they were friendly. Overlapping the present Klamath country in the vicinity of the Sican marsh dwelt a branch of the Snake Indians. But the greater portion of the present Klamath country was inhabited by the Klamaths and Modocs.

Through the country of these two tribes—the present Klamath country—led Indian trails over which the natives traveled to and from their favorite fishing grounds. Nearly all evidence of these primeval trails has been erased, although we know that they were in existence when the first white men set feet on Klamath soil.

And of these "first white men" they were, undoubtedly "the Rocky Mountain men" who visited nearly every part of the country. While there are no accounts of their visits here, there remains undeniable evidence that they were here on several occasions at a very early day—before the explorations of John C. Fremont, the "Pathfinder."

It was during the winter of 1843-4 that Fremont's party traversed the Klamath country. Coming in from the north their journal shows that they found themselves at the Klamath marsh, or, as Fremont terms it in his journal, "Tlameth lake." This point was reached December 11, 1843. Here was the Indian village Ouyx, of which Skidat, father of "Dave Hill," of later day prominence, was chief. Observing this Indian village on the border of the marsh, and unacquainted with the temper of the tribe, the "Pathfinder" discharged his cannon with the result that the Indians scattered in all directions among the willows and tules. Presently the chief and his squaw came out to meet Fremont and personally assured the latter of their friendliness. Fremont greatly admired the soft-voiced chief and his comely wife. In his journal he states that this was the first time he had known a woman to take part in the circumstances of war. The following day this chief, as a pledge of his friendship, piloted Fremont across the marsh and led him through the forest in an easterly direction to a "green savannah" which we now recognize as Sican marsh.

Fremont's party continued to the east until they won their way to Summer lake which they so named on account of finding the snow all gone at that point, although it was in the middle of the winter season. Hence they went in a southeasterly direction passing the point where is now situated the town of Paisley, passed around the north end of Abert Lake, and on to Christmas Lake, or as it is now commonly termed Warner lake.

Thus we perceive that the Klamath country, although not settled until the 60's, had previously been visited and, at least, a portion of its topography known, at a comparatively early period in the history of this country. Only a few years later, however, an enterprise was undertaken and accomplished which, while not resulting in an extensive exploration of the whole Klamath country, made a part of it very well known. This was the establishment of the South Emigrant Road in 1846, and which diverted a large part of Oregon immigration through the southern part of the present Klamath country. Let us revert to a period three years anterior and tell of the arrival of the builders of this road to Oregon.

Away back in the 40's when Oregon was a wilderness; when even its possession was in dispute between the United States and Great Britain; when no permanent American settlement had been made on the Pacific coast, that is, in 1843, a vast train of immigrants numbering some 800 people with their cattle, horses, wagons and household goods, left the Missouri river early in the spring. This party gained the Willamette valley after the closing in of winter—the first through wagon train. In this company were the three notable Applegate brothers, Charles, Lindsay and Jesse, all men who became conspicuous in the history of Oregon. Lindsay was the father of Ivan, Lucien and Oliver Applegate, early pioneers of the Klamath basin. Ivan and Lucien, aged respectively three and one years, were junior members of this expedition of 1843. Oliver, a native son of Oregon, was born two years later.

Having made permanent settlement in the Willamette valley, Lindsay and Jesse Applegate, in company with thirteen other courageous men, performed the historic feat of laying out the "South Road" to Oregon in 1846. The names of these other thirteen pioneers were: Captain Levi Scott, John (Jack) Jones, John Owens, Henry Boggs, William Sportsman, Samuel Goodhue, Robert Smith, Moses (Black) Harris, John Scott, William G. Parker, David Goff, Benjamin F. Burch and Bonnett Osborn.

Passing through the Umpqua canyon, Rogue River valley, over the Cascades, through the Klamath basin and on the Humbolt river and to Fort Hall, they conducted an emigrant train to the Willamette by that route. As they passed through the Little Klamath lake, Lost river and Tule lake countries, they noted the extent and character of the great Klamath basin.

We here present to the reader the story of the selection of the South Emigrant Road, extending from Fort Hall to the Rogue River Valley in 1846, as told in after years (about 1888 or 1890) by Lindsay Applegate, (now deceased) one of the party. This route passed through the southern parts of what are now Lake and Klamath counties:

On the morning of June 30th we moved along the north bank of the creek, and soon began the ascent of the mountains to the eastward, which we found gradual. Spending most of the day in examining the hills about the stream now called Keene creek, near the summit of the Siskiyou ridge, we moved on down through the heavy forests of pine, fir and cedar, and encamped early in the evening in a little valley now known as Round prairie, about ten or twelve miles, as nearly as we could judge, from the camp of the previous night. We found no evidence of Indians being about, but we did not relax our vigilance on that account. We encamped in a clump of pine in the valley and kept out our guard.

On the morning of July 1st, being anxious to know what we were to find ahead, we made an early start. This morning we observed the track of a lone horse leading eastward. Thinking it had been made by some Indian horseman on his way from Rogue river to the Klamath country, we undertook to follow it. This we had no trouble in doing as it had been made in the spring while the ground was damp and was very distinct until we came to a very rough, rocky ridge where we lost it. This ridge was directly in our way. Exploring northward along the divide for considerable distance without finding a practicable route across it we encamped for the night among the pines. The next morning, July 2d, we explored the ridge southward as far as the great canyon of the Klamath, but having no better success than the day before, we encamped at a little spring on the mountain side. The next day, July 3d, we again traveled northward farther than before, making a more complete examination of the country than we had previously done, and at last found what appeared to be a practicable pass. Near this was a rich, grassy valley through which ran a little stream, and here we encamped for the night. This valley is now known as Long prairie, Parker's home.

On the morning of July 4th our route bore along a ridge trending considerably toward the north. The route was good, not rocky, and the ascent very gradual. After crossing the summit of the Cascade ridge, the descent was, in places, very rapid. At noon we came out into a glade (Spencer creek) where there were water and grass and from which we could see the Klamath river. Afternoon we moved down through an immense forest, principally yellow pine, to the river, and then traveled up the north bank, still through yellow pine forests, for about six miles, when all at once we came out in full view of the Klamath country, extending eastward as far as the eye could reach. It was an exciting moment, after the many days spent in the dense forests and among the mountains, and the whole party broke forth in cheer after cheer.

An Indian who had not observed us until the shouting began, broke away from the river bank and ran to the hills a quarter of a mile away. An antelope could scarcely have made better time, for we continued shouting as he ran and his speed seemed to increase until he was lost to our view among the pines. We were now entering a country where the natives had seen but few white people. Following the river up to where it leaves the lower Klamath lake, we came to a riffle where it seemed possible to cross. William Parker waded in and explored the ford. It was deep, rocky and rapid, but we all passed over safely and then proceeded along the river and lake shore for a mile or so when we came into the main valley of the Lower Klamath lake. We could see columns of smoke rising in every direction, for our presence was already known to the Modocs and the signal fire telegraph was already in active operation. Moving southward along the shore we came to a little stream, coming in from the southward, and there found pieces of newspapers and other unmistakable evidences of civilized people having camped there a short time before. We found a place where the turf had been cut away, also the willows near the bank of the creek, and horses had been repeatedly driven over the place. As there were many places where horses could get water without this trouble some of the parties were of the opinion that some persons had been buried there and that horses had been driven over the place to obliterate all marks and thus prevent the Indians from disturbing the dead. The intense excitement among the Indians on our arrival there strengthened this opinion.

Colonel Fremont, only a few days before, had reached this point on his way northward when he was overtaken by Lieutenant Gillispie of the United States Army with important dispatches and returned to Lower California. The Mexican War had just begun and the "Pathfinder" was needed elsewhere. On the very night he was overtaken by Lieutenant Gillispie the Modocs surprised his camp, killed three of his Delaware Indians, and it is said that had it not been for the vigilance and presence of mind of Kit Carson, he would have suffered a complete rout. At this place we arranged our camp on open ground so that the Indians could not possibly approach us without discovery. It is likely that the excitement among the Modocs was caused, more than anything else, by the apprehension that ours was a party sent to chastise them for their attack on Fremont. We were but a handful of men surrounded by hundreds of Indians armed with their poisoned arrows, but by dint of great care and vigilance we were able to pass through their country safely. On every line of travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific there had been great loss of life from a failure to exercise a proper degree of caution, and too often have reckless and foolhardy men, who have, through the want of proper care, become embroiled in difficulties with the Indians, gained the reputation of being Indian fighters and heroes, while the men who were able to conduct parties in safety through the country of warlike savages, escaped the world's notice.

On the morning of July 5th we left our camp on the little creek (now called Hot creek), and continued our course along the shores of Lower Klamath lake. This threw us off our course considerably, as the lake extended some miles to the southward of our last camp, and we did not reach the eastern shore until the day was far spent. We camped on the lake shore and the next morning, July 6th, we ascended a high, rocky ridge to the eastward for the purpose of making observations. Near the base of the ridge on the east, was a large lake, perhaps twenty miles in length. Beyond it to the eastward we could see a timbered butte, apparently thirty miles distant, at the base of which there appeared to be a low pass through the mountain range which seemed to encircle the lake basin. It appearing practicable to reach this pass by passing around the north end of the lake, we decided to adopt that route and began the descent of the ridge, but we soon found ourselves in the midst of an extremely rugged country. Short lava ridges ran in every direction, while between them were caves and crevices into which it seemed our animals were in danger of falling headlong. The farther we advanced the worse became the route, so that at length we decided to retrace our steps to the smooth country. This was difficult as our horses had become separated among the rocks, and it was some time before we could get them together and return to the open ground. Then we discovered that one of our party, David Goff, was missing. While in the lava field he had discovered a band of mountain sheep and in pursuing them had lost his way. Some of the party went quite a distance within the rocks, but could hear nothing of him. We decided to proceed to the meadow country, at the head of the lake, encircling the lava beds to the northward and encamp until we could find our comrade. While we were proceeding to carry out this program we discovered a great number of canoes leaving the lake shore under the bluffs, and making for what appeared to be an island four or five miles distant. We could, also see a lone horseman riding leisurely along the lake shore, approaching us. This soon proved to be our lost friend. The Modocs had discovered him in the lava fields, and probably expecting that the whole party were about to assail them from the rocks, took to their canoes. He said that, seeing the Indians retreating, he concluded to leave the rocks and ride along the lake shore, where the going was good. We nooned in a beautiful meadow containing about two sections near the head of the lake.

After spending a couple of hours in this splendid pasture, we repacked and started on our way toward the timbered butte, but had not proceeded more than a mile before we came suddenly upon a large stream (Lost river) coming into the lake. We found this stream near the lake very deep, with almost perpendicular banks, so that we were compelled to turn northward up the river. Before proceeding far we discovered an Indian crouched under the bank and, surrounding him, made him come out. By signs we indicated to him that we wanted to cross the river. By marking on his legs and pointing up the river he gave us to understand that there was a place above where we could easily cross. Motioning him to advance he led the way up the river about a mile and pointed out a place where an immense rock crossed the river. The sheet of water running over the rock was about fifteen inches deep, while the principal part of the river seemed to flow under. This was the famous Stone Bridge on Lost river so often mentioned after this by travelers. For many years the waters of Tule lake have been gradually rising, so that now the beautiful meadow on which we nooned on the day we discovered the bridge is covered by the lake, and the back water in Lost river long ago made the river impassable; is now probably ten feet deep over the bridge.

After crossing the bridge we made our pilot some presents, and all shaking hands with him, left him standing on the river bank. Pursuing our way along the northern shore of the lake a few miles, we came to a beautiful spring, near the base of the mountains on our left and encamped for the night. After using the alkali water of Lower Klamath lake the previous night, the fresh, cool water of this spring was a real luxury. There was plenty of dry wood and an abundance of green grass for our animals and we enjoyed the camp exceedingly. Sitting around the fire that evening we discussed the adventures of the past few days in this new, strange land. The circumstances of the last day had been particularly interesting. Our adventure in the rocks, the retreat of the whole Modoc tribe in a fleet of thirty or forty canoes across the lake from Goff, the singularity of the natural bridge, the vast fields of tule around the lake, and the fact that the lake was an independent body of water, were subjects of peculiar interest and only intensified our desire to see more of this then wild land.

July 7th we left the valley of Tule lake to pursue our course eastward over a rocky table land among scattering juniper trees. We still observed the timbered butte as our landmark, and traveled as directly toward it as the country would admit. This butte is near the state line, between Clear and Goose lakes and probably distant fifty miles from the lava ridge west of Lost river, from which we first observed it, supposing it to be about thirty miles away. In pursuing our course we passed through the hilly, juniper country between Langell valley and Clear lake without seeing either the valley or the lake, and at noon arrived at the bed of a stream where there was but little water. The course of this stream was north or northwest and appearances indicated that at times quite a volume of water flowed in the channel. This was, evidently, the bed of Lost river, a few miles north of where this singular stream leaves the Clear lake marsh.

Leaving this place we pursued our journey through a similar country to that passed over during the forenoon, and encamped at a little spring among the junipers, near the base of the timbered hill, and passed a very pleasant night.

On the morning of July 8th we passed our landmark and traveled nearly eastward, over a comparatively level but extremely rocky country, and nooned in the channel of another stream where there was a little water standing in holes. On leaving this place we found the country still quite level but exceedingly rocky—for eight or ten miles almost like a pavement. Late in the afternoon we came out into the basin of a lake (Goose lake) apparently forty or fifty miles in length. Traversing the valley about five miles along the south end of the lake we came to a little stream coming in from the mountains to the eastward. The grass and water being good, we encamped here for the night. Game seemed plentiful, and one of the party killed a fine deer near the camp. From the spur of the mountains near our camp, we had a splendid view of the lake and of the extensive valley bordering it on the north. On the east between the lake and mountain range running nearly north and south and which we supposed to be a spur of the Sierra Nevadas, was a beautiful meadow country, narrow, but many miles in length, across which the lines of willows and scattering pines and cottonwoods indicated the courses of a number of little streams coming into the lake from a mountain chain. A little southeast of our camp there appeared to be a gap in the mountain wall, and we decided to try it on the succeeding day.

Space will not permit us to publish in full the very entertaining article written by Mr. Applegate. There is much in his narrative that bears directly on the country west of the Cascades and east of the territory embraced within the limits of the territory now under consideration. There is, however, a great deal that is necessary to complete the earlier history of Klamath county, and this we shall continue, confining our work to such scope of country as falls within the perspective of our story. It was on the morning of July 14th that, according to plans matured at Black Rock, the explorers divided into two parties; eight men leaving in a southerly direction, and seven men, including Mr. Lindsay Applegate, laid their course to the east. The survey was continued until July 23d, when they ascended by a very gradual route to the table lands from which they could plainly see Black Rock. Exploring the country about them they found the Rabbit Hole Springs. Continuing his narrative Mr. Applegate says:

The line of our road was now complete. We had succeeded in finding a route across the desert and on to the Oregon settlements with camping places at suitable distances, and since we knew the source of the Humboldt river was near Fort Hall, we felt that our enterprise was already a success, and that immigrants would be able to reach Oregon late in the season with far less danger of being snowed in than on the Columbia route down the Humboldt and over the Sierra Nevadas. The sequel proved that we were correct in this opinion, for this same fall the Donner party, in endeavoring to cross the Sierras, were snowed in, suffered the most indescribable horrors, and about half of them perished.

Among other interesting events related by Mr. Applegate is the rescue of a party of immigrants en route to the Willamette valley. Mr. Applegate says:

So soon as we could possibly make the arrangements we sent out a party with oxen and horses to meet the immigrants and aid them in reaching the Willamette settlements. For this assistance we made no demand, nor did we tax them for the use of the road as was alleged by parties inimical to our enterprise. It had been the distinct understanding that the road should be free, and the consciousness of having opened better means of access to the country than was afforded by the expensive and dangerous route down the Columbia which we had tried to our sorrow, would be ample compensation for all our labors in opening the South road.

Of course our enterprise was opposed by that mighty monopoly, the Hudson's Bay Company, whose line of forts and trading posts on the Columbia, afforded them rare opportunities for trade with the immigrants. Many of the immigrants who followed us during the fall of 1846 had a hard time, though not as hard as they would have experienced on the other route; and some of them, not understanding the situation fully, became infected with the spirit of persecution, which had its origin with the Hudson's Bay Company, and joined in charging us with leading the travel away from the Northern Route for purposes of personal speculation. Certain members of the party were singled out to bear the burden of persecution, whereas, if any member of the party was animated by improper motives in seeking to open the road, all were equally guilty, as the party was governed in all its proceedings by a majority vote of all of its members.

The efforts of the Hudson's Bay Company to put down the road proved an eminent failure. Its superior advantages were better and better known and appreciated every year. It never ceased to be an important route of travel, and a large portion of the population of our state entered by this channel. It is a very significant fact that the great thoroughfare of today, from the Willamette to the Siskiyou chain, and thence out through the Lake country and on to the Humboldt, departs rarely from the route blazed out by the road company 42 years ago.

So early as 1848 an abortive effort was made to settle the Klamath country. The strenuous party who two years before had traversed the territory in "blazing" the South Emigrant Road had been favorably impressed with the natural beauties and possibilities of that country. A number of them developed a plan of settlement of such an inviting field. The historic "Klamath Commonwealth," was organized in 1848; the scene was the Willamette settlement; the principal projectors, Jesse and Lindsay Applegate. Preparations were made to start a colony at some available point in the Klamath country.

Preparations were elaborate; all agencies were brought to bear to make the venture a success. The party was a strong one; danger from Indians were fully realized; the party was heavily armed and fully organized. Among them were farmers, blacksmiths, carpenters, millers, doctors, millwrights and nearly all classes of people. Eastward to the Klamath country they headed, accompanied by a long and amply guarded train of wagons conveying everything which they believed might prove necessary in a settlement outside of all practical communication with civilization.

Had it not been for the discovery of gold in California the entire earlier history of Klamath county would, doubtless, have read far different from what it does in the Year of Our Lord, 1905. For it should be known that this gold discovery wrought dissensions in the Klamath Commonwealth, and this pioneer enterprise proved but Dead Sea apples, attractive to the eye but ashes to the taste. The original design never reached fruition. A portion of the community were strongly in favor of carrying out their original schemes; an equally strong opposition were determined to seek the land of gold. Leaving the South Emigrant Road the whole party proceeded to Strawberry Valley, California, when opinions as to the course to be pursued becoming widely divergent, caused a complete disruption of the entire enterprise. The once brilliant plan of settling the Klamath country faded from view and was abandoned. A portion of the commonwealth proceeded to the gold fields in Sacramento; the balance of the party returned to their homes in the Willamette valley. That portion which decided to seek the gold fields encountered Peter Lassen at the head of an emigrant train, and assisted him in exploring a route to the Sacramento valley.

In those parlous pioneer days it should be remembered that all "roads," "routes" and "trails" of travel were dangerous. Following the completion of the South Emigrant Road in 1846 by the Applegates and party, much of the travel to the settlements west of the Cascades was made via this route in preference to the northern route by way of the Dalles of the Columbian river. But severe was the penalty paid by these immigrants for their choice!

The Modoc Indians in the country along that part of the road where it passed through the southern portion of the Klamath country, Oregon, and the northern portion of the present Modoc county, California, earned the character of the most barbarous and blood-thirsty savages west of the Rocky mountains. Peculiarly adapted was this country to protect them in their depredations, slaughter and cruelties; to shield them from successful pursuit, punishment or capture. Following sudden and impetuous raids on wagon trains, they could retire into the impregnable lava beds where nothing less than a large and well equipped army could dislodge them from their coign of vantage as was learned later in the Modoc war of 1872-3. Not only were they able to exact a heavy tribute from the emigrants, but their possession of the strongholds of the lava beds made it possible for the Modocs to exert a powerful influence and control of the neighboring tribes.

Innocent and unoffending immigrants, accompanied by their families, passing through the Modoc country along the old southern immigrant road, were attacked and butchered indiscriminately by these painted savages; their property confiscated or destroyed; their bodies inhumanly mutilated, and left unburied, a prey to wolves. In some cases the victims of these Modocs were caused to suffer excruciating tortures before relieved by death. In some cases girls were kept among them as captives for months; to suffer more than torture, with death only to crown their miserable existence.

More than 300 immigrants are known to have been slain in this manner by Modoc Indians; facts ascertained by actual count of their bleaching skeletons along the road, previous to the establishment of the military post at Fort Klamath in 1863. Where the road met the shores of Tule lake was a favorite point of attack; it appropriately gained the name of "Bloody Point." Here were enacted tragedies of the bloodiest description—tragedies that, even at this late day, cause one to shudder on visiting the scene. Here the Modocs would fall upon the poor, weary and footsore immigrants as they wended their way along the point. Speaking of Bloody Point, Major C. S. Drew, when in 1863, he recommended the establishment of a military post in the Klamath country, said:

"Since 1846 one hundred and fifty-one persons have been murdered and an estimate of about three hundred other persons more or less seriously wounded by Indians in that vicinity."

Certainly, it appears incredible that the United States government had not before taken some effective steps in protecting this country. According to records of the war department the government had little to do with the Modocs until the establishment of the post at Fort Klamath in 1863. Aside from the volunteered efforts of settlers west of the Cascade mountains in occasionally assisting immigrants through the country, no efforts were made to check the murders committed or to punish the red fiends who committed them, with the exception of the Ben Wright expedition in 1852.

Of course no idea of settling in such a country was entertained by any one. Yet we find that when practical military protection was at last granted, the country was quite rapidly settled—for that period in Oregon's history. Little did these immigrants—passing westward in the shadow of death—dream that this country would ever be fit for the habitation of white men. To them the Klamath country was only a land of sage brush plains, big lakes and Modoc Indians.

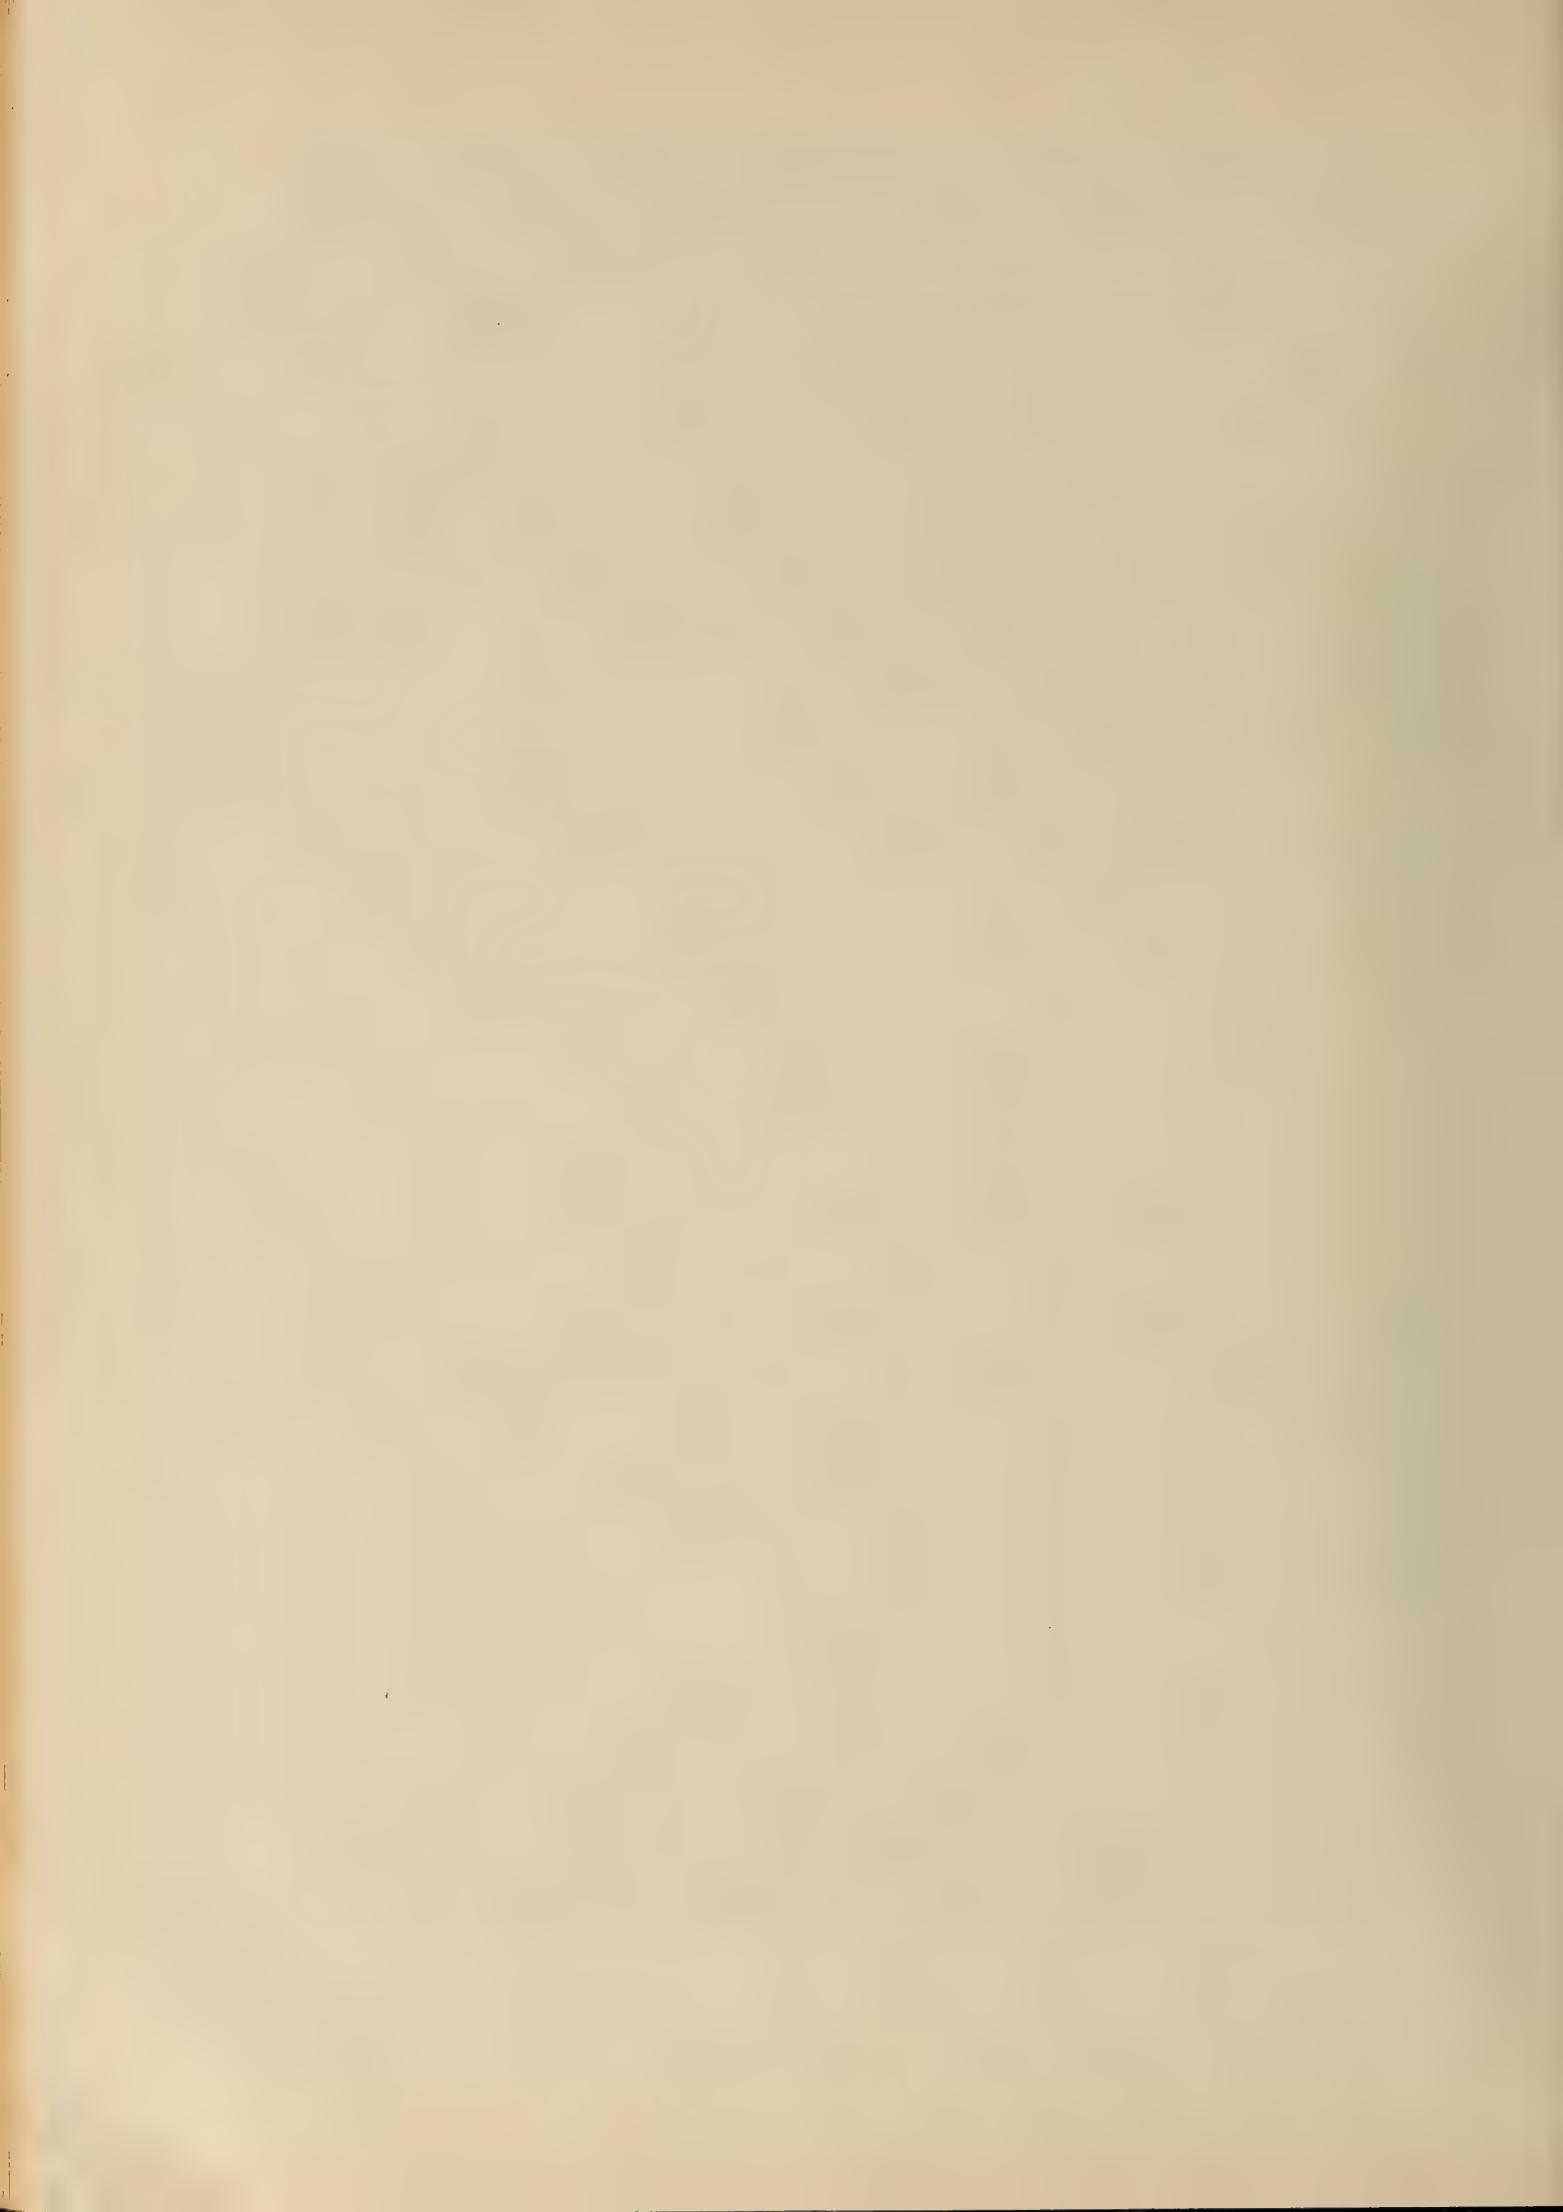

In the spring of 1852 a party was packing from Scottsburg to Yreka. One evening while camped about 1½ miles south of Cole's place, on the west side of the mountains, Indians stole four of their horses. Four of these packers at once set out in pursuit. They trailed the Indians to their camp, on the present site of Keno. Here the packers fell upon the Indians—about 16 of them—completely surprised them and killed four of the hostiles. The rest escaped across the Klamath river. The packers found their stolen horses and returned with them. Jerden Metland was one of the party.

Williamson River at the Mouth of Spring Creek

The same year an attack was made on immigrants at Bloody Point in which many of them were killed, and to wreak vengeance upon these Modocs and teach them a lasting lesson, a company of volunteers was formed at Yreka, California, and proceeded to the Modoc country. This company was under command of one Ben Wright. They rapidly advanced to the Modoc country, and in Lost River valley, near where now stands the town of Merrill, they killed 40 Indians out of a party of 47. Of this sensational campaign many conflicting stories are told. As stated by the volunteers they met the Indians in council; that treachery was apparent on the part of the savages and in order to save themselves they administered the first blow. The facts appear to be that a big barbecue had been arranged for, at which was to be served an ox roasted whole, which animal had been brought with the volunteers from Yreka. The whites and Indians were then to meet in friendly council and, if possible, come to an amicable understanding. Before the feast, however, a Modoc squaw, friendly to the whites, told Wright that treachery was intended and that at the feast all the whites were to be massacred. Ben Wright was a man who did not hesitate to act when immediate action was imperative. Without further delay he fell upon the unsuspecting Modocs.

There were those, however, who maintained that the Ben Wright party was guilty of the basest treachery and that their conduct was a shade darker than anything ever attempted by savages; that Wright had no reason to believe that treachery was intended, and that his action was wilful and premeditated murder.

Without discussing the merits of the case, we will state that then and there the Modocs were taught a severe lesson, and one which they did not soon forget. Upon their return to Yreka the volunteers, who were miners from that famous mining camp, were received with all the honors of conquering heroes. If their conduct in dealing with these Indians was not of the best, it is certain that censure was not apparent at home. We here reproduce a short article written by E. Steele, a frontiersman who for many years had dealings with various tribes of Indians. It is only proper to state that little credence can be placed in the poisoning story related:

The Modoc War of 1852 took place whilst I was away at Crescent City; therefore all I know of that is hearsay; but I know that it was generally known that Ben Wright had concocted the plan of poisoning those Indians at a feast, but that his interpreter Indian, Livile, had exposed the plot to them so that but few ate of the meat, and that Wright and his company then fell upon the Indians and killed 40 out of 47, and the others died of the poison afterward. There is one of the company now in the county who gives this version, and I heard Wright swearing about Dr. Ferber, our then druggist, selling him an adulterated article of strychnine, which he said the doctor wanted to kill coyotes. That the plan was concocted before they left Yreka defeats the claim now made for them that they only anticipated the treachery of the Indians. John Schonchis was one of the Indians that escaped, and in a late interview he made this an excuse for not coming out to meet the commissioners during the Modoc War of 1873. The story of the Indians corresponds so well with what I have frequently heard from our own people, before it became so much of a disgrace by the reaction, that I have no doubt of the correctness in its general details. At the time others, as well as myself, told Wright that the transaction would sometime react fearfully upon some innocent ones of our people, but so long a time had elapsed that I had concluded that the matter was nearly forgotten by all, and that nothing would come of it, until the night of my second visit in the cave, when Schonchis would get very excited talking of it as an excuse for not going out.

Adverse criticism of the proceedings of the Ben Wright party is nil among the pioneers still living who were in the country at the time the event occurred. By their personal admissions the Indians for years had been guilty of most cruel murders committed upon immigrants. They had put to death by torture those whom they had captured; they had taken captive white girls and women and compelled them to live with them. Many of the Ben Wright party were relatives of those who had been murdered by the Modocs. Opinion has been freely expressed that had it been Wright's intention to poison the Modocs, as suggested, it was justified by the crimes that had been committed by the savages.

The following version of the Ben Wright affair is given by the Alturas (Cal.) Plaindealer in 1902.

Somebody has surely been "stuffing" DeLaney (correspondent of a Portland paper). The latter says it was Mose Hart of Malheur county. But the utter absurdity of arming Ben Wright's men with Winchester rifles should have warned our friend of the hoax, as Winchesters were unheard of until 12 years later. The old Henry rifle, the forerunner of the Winchester, was not placed in the hands of our soldiers until late in 1863.

The true story of the "Ben Wright massacre," as some have been pleased to term it, and as detailed to us by Frank Riddle, one of Wright's men, was in substance as follows: It must be remembered that the Modoc Indians in 1850 and in 1851 had committed all kinds of atrocities upon the immigrants. Hundreds had been massacred. Colonel Ross in 1850 had arrived from Jacksonville with a company of miners in time to bury 100 men, women and children. He remained in the country until the remainder had passed safely through the Modoc country. The next year John F. Miller arrived at Bloody Point on Tule lake just in time to save a large train that was surrounded and would most certainly have perished but for his timely arrival. The Indians were fiercely attacked and severely punished. Many were killed and the remainder chased into the lava beds where they were safe from pursuit. He also captured a good many of their women and children. These were held until the immigrants passed when they were turned loose.

In the fall of 1852 news was received at Yreka that a large immigration was coming. Knowing the danger, Ben Wright organized a company of 32 men. They were well armed with rifles and revolvers. He proceeded to the Modoc country and escorted the immigrants safely through. The lesson taught the year before by Miller and his men had had its effect. The Indians came in and proposed a treaty. Ben Wright was then encamped at the peninsula. The Indians were feasted on an ox that Wright had purchased from the immigrants. They told Wright they had two captive white girls which they would surrender so soon as they could be brought in. Several days were spent in waiting when Wright moved his camp to Lost river, near where Merrill now stands. The Indians accompanied him and camped close by. Days of waiting occurred, the Indians all the time protesting good faith. But Wright and his men had noticed that the Indians were increasing in numbers. One morning he told his men that they were trapped. He bade them get ready, and at a signal they were to fire their rifles and charge with revolvers. He told his men that he was going to the Indian camp, would demand of the chief the instant delivery of the captive girls, and if refused or further delay was sought, that he would kill the chief then and there. That to pay no attention to him as they would all, probably, be killed anyway.

Accordingly Ben Wright went to the camp 75 yards away. He told the chief he had come for the girls. The chief said in reply that he would not deliver them and had never intended to do so. That he had men enough to kill all the white men and would do it. Scarcely had the words escaped the lips of the treacherous old savage than Ben Wright whipped a revolver from beneath his blanket and shot him dead. He then, with a revolver in each hand, fought his way out as best he could. The instant that the first shot rang out, the men in waiting opened with their rifles, and then charged, revolvers in hand. This sudden onslaught terrified the savages who, after two or three ineffective volleys of arrows, fled in dismay. Many jumped into the river and attempted to hide under the steep banks.

They were punched out with willow poles, and shot while struggling in the water. Others hid in the sage brush and were hunted out and shot as they ran. About 185 of the savages were killed and most of them scalped to prove to friends in Yreka that they had done good work. After the fight Wright and his men returned to Yreka. Ben Wright was afterward assassinated by a half-breed while acting as agent on a coast reservation. This is the true and unvarnished story of the Ben Wright massacre.

The two captive girls were never released. One was killed at Hot Creek by the chief to settle a quarrel among the Indians. The writer and Judge Bellinger made a search and found a portion of her remains scattered about in the rocks where the body had been thrown. The other girl probably met a similar fate.

Shortly after the Wright expedition another one was dispatched, in 1853, to punish the Modocs for fresh atrocities. This was commanded by a detachment of regular soldiers, under command of Captain Mack Bushy, and California volunteers. They encountered the Modocs in Northern California and defeated them. These Indians were driven to the shores of Clear lake, where they took to their canoes and sought refuge on an island where they believed themselves safe from further pursuit. The soldiers, however, camped near the lake, constructed boats, attacked the hostiles on their island and again defeated them.

During the very early days a few fur traders penetrated the Klamath country, as they did all portions of the northwest. One of the best known of these traders who visited the Klamath country was Mart Frain, and the knowledge he gained of the customs of the Indians who dwelt in the Klamath basin was extensive. The Klamath Falls Express of May 5, 1892, related one of Mr. Frain's experiences in Klamath land, when that country was known to only a few traders and explorers, as gleaned from an interview with Mr. Frain. The Express said:

Thirty-five years ago last Saturday night, April 30, 1857, Mr. Frain camped out under the big ledge of rocks on the river bank near which Reames, Martin & Company's store now stands. He had journeyed from Yreka with five mules laden with beads which he intended trading to the Indians for furs. He arrived on the west bank of the river in the afternoon and on the opposite side—the present townsite of Linkville—were camped bands of Modocs, Klamath, Snake and Cayuse Indians who had assembled to trade their furs. It was "barter day"—the natives never failing to congregate at certain times of the moon as it was a popular belief that the fish would not come up the river if the formal gathering were not held at the regular period. Frain swam his mules across the river and a squaw conveyed his beads and saddle over on a tule float, which had in the center a hole through which she thrust her limbs, using her feet as paddles. By sundown the beads were in the hands of the Indians and Frain was in possession of 1,200 skins. The night was devoted to gambling for the beads at an "odd or even" game, and as there was an element of science as well as luck in the transactions, it was not long before a dozen of the most expert natives owned the greater bulk of the ornaments.

"There was one kind of pelt that I never obtained," said Mr. Frain. "On barter days the richer Indians brought with them for show stuffed white deer, the skins of which were worth from $75 to $150 apiece, and the Indians would rarely part with them. Occasionally they would sell one for Indian money called allicochick—a shell obtained from the Queen Charlotte islands. A piece of this shell reaching from the line of the palm of one's hand to the middle joint of the little finger was worth $5; nearly every native had a scale of measurement marked on his arm, from the shoulder to the elbow, and ten pieces of shell that would reach from the end of the thumb to a certain mark on the arm were valued at $100; the smaller and less valuable pieces were worth $25 a fathom. The Indians prized allicochick so highly that they would pay handsomely in gold for the smallest amount."

"Were your relations peaceable with the Indians?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Frain, "and would have continued so had not the whites popped down one every now and then. That reminds me of one of their very odd customs. The Indians would not revenge themselves upon the murderer of one of their number, but instead would kill the near relatives, beginning with the father and slaughtering the whole family except the murderer before they were appeased; their idea being that if they killed the man who did the shooting his death would not occasion him so much grief as would the loss of his relatives.

"Their burial ceremony was peculiar and lasted two days, accompanied by feasting and dancing, and at the conclusion the departed brave's squaw shaved her head and wore a hat, largely made of pitch, for several moons."

as they journeyed through the extreme southern portion of the county on their way to the settlements west of the mountains and by fur traders who penetrated the country. However, we find that one or two stockmen had the hardihood to winter stock in this wilderness during the late 50's. As a matter of history it might prove interesting to know that Judge F. Adams was the first man to introduce a band of cattle into Klamath county. He grazed 2,000 head where Keno now stands, in the winter of 1856. He was undisturbed by Indians, having made terms with Captain Jack. Judge Adams stated that the winter was quite mild; the wild rye so high and plentiful that stock came out in the spring fat and ready for market. He sold 1,100 cattle at $80 a head at Yreka and the northern California mining towns.

Another of these pioneer stockman was Wendolen Nus, who during the winter of 1858-9 grazed a band of stock on the Klamath river, where is now the ranch of O. A. Stearns a few miles southeast of Klamath Falls. Mr. Nus later went to the John Day mines, but returned to the Klamath country in the 60's and became the first settler of the county.

Under Lieutenant Piper, in 1859, a detachment of soldiers from Fort Jones penetrated the Klamath country. For a short period they camped upon the soil of the present Klamath county. Lieutenant Piper was with an expedition looking for stock that had been stolen by Indians. For a few days he camped on the west side of Klamath river, just below the present site of the town of Keno, at the place known in early days as "the cabins." Proceeding up the river the soldiers, when they gained a point which is now the O. A. Stearns' ranch, saw a band of Indians approaching them. Not knowing whether the Indians were peaceably inclined or not, the soldiers hastily threw up entrenchments near the river bank, and prepared to defend themselves should an attack be meditated. A few trees were felled and around these was thrown up the earth. But the Indians proved to be peaceable. A conference took place; Lieutenant Piper was confident that the stolen stock was not in the neighborhood; the troops resumed their line of march. Wendolen Nus was in the vicinity at the time with a band of stock. Later he related the incident to the early settlers. Mr. O. A. Stearns afterward took up the land, and while one day mowing a meadow found the intrenchments at the spot described by Mr. Nus.

Because of the knowledge gained quite valuable was an expedition made through this territory in 1861. A portion of the country visited had never before been explored. As a result of this trip Fort Klamath was established which made possible the settlement of the country. Lindsay Applegate, one of the two brothers who selected the South Emigrant Road, at the head of a company of 42 volunteers, crossed the Cascades and proceeding to Bloody Point on Tule lake there met an emigrant train menaced by Modoc Indians. Wallace Baldwin, of Klamath Falls was a member of the party and has furnished us valuable data relative to the meeting of the emigrant train at that point. The party were met by Chief Schonchin and his warriors. They first inquired if the party had come to

"We replied that we had not," says Mr. Baldwin, "but that we were prepared for just such an emergency. The Indians sized us up, counted our men and evidently came to the conclusion that their mission was, also, peaceful. Upon inquiry concerning the whereabouts of the immigrant train that we were to meet, Schonchin maintained that he knew nothing of it. We decided to push on further. Instead of following the road, at the instigation of the Indians, we proceeded by a "cut-off" trail, which Schonchin said would, and which did, save us many miles of travel. However, when we again reached the road we found that the train had recently passed while we had been on the trail recommended us by the Indians. We suspected treachery and immediately set out on a forced march to overtake the train. We should not have been surprised to find the immigrants massacred and the Indians in readiness to attack our party. But such was not the case. We came upon the immigrants safe, but greatly alarmed by actions of the Indians who were endeavoring to approach the train, as they explained, to tell the new arrivals of our whereabouts. The immigrants would not allow the Indians to approach, and in this antagonistic position we found them. They had experienced a severe journey, and all they had left to eat was a cow recently killed. We were well supplied with provisions and, if I ever saw a grateful party of men and women, it was that same band of immigrants."

Anxious to see more of the Klamath country, Mr. Applegate divided his company, sending twenty men with the train to Rogue river valley, while with the remaining twenty-two he journeyed up Lost river valley, passed near the site of the present town of Klamath Falls, on up the east side of Upper Klamath lake, crossed the Wood river valley and returned to Rogue river by the way of the Dead Indian country. The members of this party were:

Captain Lindsay Applegate, First Lieutenant C. F. Blake, Ivan Applegate, Marion Anderson, George Brown, Wallace Baldwin, A. J. Walls, William Songer, Joseph Wells, Giles Wells, Jr., I. P. Chandler, Norman Lee, John McCoy, Rash Simpson, Robert Tenbrook, Louis Hyatt, William Jaquett, D. F. Cole, G. W. Gaskell, William Harris, Warren Vennoi, Mike Murphy, William Pittenger, Peter Smith, John Sperry, John Robinson, William Steward, F. F. Fulton, J. W. Mills, Thomas Williams, J. C. Raper, J. J. Carter, Charles Sumner, David Laugherty, J. P. Woodson, William West, Samuel Richey, W. W. Shedd, Daniel Chapman, C. F. Blake, Isaac McCoy, Ben Johnson.

In the early 60's the discovery of gold in the John Day country of northern Oregon was the incentive to considerable travel through the future Klamath county. During 1861 and 1862 several different parties went from California to the mining districts in the north, driving stock and taking in provisions and mining utensils by means of pack trains. Their route through the territory was by way of Tule lake, Lost river, Sprague river, Sican marsh, Silver lake and thence to the north.

Observing more of the extent, fertility and resources of the Klamath country on the trip of 1861, previously mentioned, it was resolved to take advantage of every opportunity offered for opening up the country for settlement. Lindsay Applegate was enthusiastic in his desire to see a military post established in the Lake region for the two-fold purpose of protecting travel on the South Road through the Modoc country, and to encourage the income of settlement. As a member of the Oregon legislature in 1862 he advocated the passage of a memorial to congress praying for the establishment of Fort Klamath and the negotiation of a treaty with the Klamath and Modoc Indians. These measures proving successful the fort was located in 1863.

It may be stated that the establishment of the post was by the advice of General Alvord, then in command of the district of Oregon. He maintained that the post was necessary to "protect the emigrant roads and the frontier settlements." Although General Alvord was in command of the district of Oregon, the site was selected by Colonel C. S. Drew who made a trip into the interior for the purpose.

As we have stated Fort Klamath was established to protect travel through the Klamath country. Up to this period there was not a settler in the whole of what is now Klamath county, and the only route of travel was via the old emigrant road. Why, then, was the fort established at its present location in preference to a point nearer the road where troops would be of some use in protecting emigrant trains? This is explained as follows:

When the Oregon legislature memorialized congress for the establishment of a military post in the Klamath country, no suggestion was made as to a definite location. It was, of course, understood that it would be located near the road. Pine Grove was a point mentioned by many who had become acquainted with the country and certainly it would have been much more desirable than the one selected. Entering into the situation of the fight was jealously existing between the towns of Ashland and Jacksonville on the west side of the mountains. Ashland favored a location on Lost river, or at some point near the road. Jacksonville, per contra, realized the advantage this would give its rival town which, being nearer, would have the advantage in furnishing supplies to the post, etc., and laid its plans to have the post located where the advantage would be with Jacksonville. Colonel Charles Drew, who recommended the site, was favorable to the county seat town—Jacksonville—and his influence prevailed. A road over an impracticable route was built from Jacksonville to the site selected. The post was established where Jacksonville wanted it, but the folly of the choice was apparent ever after. The road, the first to penetrate the county, beside the old South Emigrant road, was built in 1863 by the soldiers under Colonel Drew when that officer was on his trip to select a site for the post. The road was as bad as could well be imagined and after the other road was built in 1865 by Captain Sprague it was not used.

At the date of establishment of Fort Klamath the Civil war was in progress. Regular troops were all in the east; the fort was first garrisoned by Oregon volunteers. The original garrison stationed at the post was Troop C, First Oregon Cavalry, under command of Captain William Kelly. They arrived in the fall of 1862 and during that winter lived in tents. In the spring were begun the fort buildings, all of which were completed in the spring of 1864. A primitive sawmill was installed at the fort, which prepared lumber for the buildings. The structures erected this year, and which served until the regulars garrisoned the post, were nearly all built of box lumber, a few of logs. There were four officers' quarters, the adjutant's office, a guard house and arsenal of logs, a quartermaster's and commissary store house, also of logs; hospital, barracks for two companies in one long, double building, with two small additions, for first sergeants' offices, stables for two troops of cavalry, the best and most substantial of all the buildings; a company bakery and four log houses occupied by the families of the married men of the troop.

In the spring of 1865, Company I, First Oregon Infantry, which had been recruited in Jackson county the preceding year, was stationed at the post. Captain Franklin B. Sprague was the company commander. Major W. V. Reinhart, of the same regiment, was in command of the post. In 1865 the second road was built from Fort Klamath across the mountains to Jacksonville. The work was done by members of Company I, First Oregon Infantry, under command of Captain Sprague. This time a more practicable route was selected and a fairly good road was the result. The Drew road was such an impossible one that when Captain Sprague took charge of the post early in 1865, he asked permission of the government to select a route and build a new road. This permission was granted, and with John Mathews, a mulatto, and old hunter and frontiersman, Captain Sprague selected the route, and the road was built by the members of Company I.

The post received another troop of the First Oregon Cavalry in the fall of 1865. This was Troop A, of which Captain John McCall was commander. All these troops remained there until the spring of 1866, when the two cavalry troops were ordered to Vancouver to be mustered out of service. Company I remained at the fort until July, 1867, when it was relieved and moved to Jacksonville, where it was mustered out on the 19th of that month.

The Civil War was now over and thereafter Fort Klamath was garrisoned by regular troops. Captain Sprague's company was relieved by Troop A, First United States Cavalry, commanded by First Lieutenant John Snell. Captain McGregor, of the same troop arrived later and took command of the fort. The regular troops at once began the erection of new buildings at the fort, all of which were completed in 1868; the ruins of the others may still be seen on the old site. In 1870 Troop B, of the First Cavalry, commanded by Captain James Jackson, relieved Troop A, and at the outbreak of the Modoc War Major John Green, of the First Cavalry, was in command of the fort.

Following the Modoc War, Fort Klamath was garrisoned by a few regular troops until 1889, when it was abandoned. In 1886 the government was on the point of ordering its abandonment, but so many urgent protests against such a course were received in Washington from the people of Klamath county that the order was not issued.

September 28, 1886, a mass meeting of citizens was held at Linkville to protest against the proposed abandonment of Fort Klamath and the removal of United States troops. County Judge G. W. Smith was chairman of the meeting and J.

W. Hamaker was made secretary. The people were very much in earnest in protesting against the removal of troops and adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, It is proposed by the Hon. Secretary of War to abandon Fort Klamath, in this county, and to remove the United States troops therefrom; and,

Whereas, The Klamath, Modoc and other tribes and bands of Indians located on the Klamath Indian reservation, located in said county, have always required the presence of a strong military force in the vicinity of said reservation in order to maintain peace; and

Whereas, It was the inadequacy of the military force at said post that was the cause of the Modoc War of 1872-3; and

Whereas, There is at present only a small fragment of one company of troops at Fort Klamath; and

Whereas, owing to the present disputes between the whites and Indians as to the boundary lines of the reservation, the constant trespassing thereon (as alleged by the Indians) of cattle, horses and other animals belonging to the whites; the constant driving off of those animals by the Indians; the recent killing of an Indian by a white man, growing out of these disputes; all these facts show that there is imminent danger of another Indian war unless Fort Klamath is strengthened by additional troops; and

Whereas, An adequate military force is as necessary to protect the Indians from trespass and injury by whites, as to protect the whites from trespass and injury by the Indians, therefore be it resolved:

First: That we respectfully and earnestly protest against the proposed abandonment of Fort Klamath, and request that the order therefor be countermanded, or indefinitely suspended.

Second: That we most respectfully and urgently urge and request the Hon. Secretary of War to increase the military force at Fort Klamath to at least two companies of cavalry.

Third: That we heartily endorse and approve the able letter on this subject addressed by Senator John H. Mitchell, of Oregon, to the Hon. Secretary of War.

Fourth: That a copy of the proceedings of this meeting be forwarded immediately to the Hon. Secretary of War, and to each member of our delegation in congress.

Thus for a time the people of Klamath county were able to postpone the abandonment of the fort. But an order for the removal of the troops came a few years later. In 1889, after having been garrisoned 26 years Fort Klamath was abandoned. An earnest remonstrance was forwarded to the authorities at Washington, but this time it did not prevail. As an excuse for the abandonment the government said that it was much more economical to retain a large body of troops at one post than to scatter them throughout the country at a number of small stations, adding that there was now no necessity for troops at that point.

During the Indian unrest and occasional uprisings caused by the Messiah craze throughout the west in 1890 and 1891, the people of Klamath county made efforts to induce the government to regarrison Fort Klamath. Their efforts were unavailing. The following letter from the secretary of war to Congressman Hermann, explains how that gentleman felt in regard to the matter:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th ultimo, calling attention to the defenseless condition of the Pacific coast and Oregon frontier, and stating that the buildings and cavalry stables at Fort Klamath are all in good repair and that there is a very general desire on the part of the people in that vicinity that troops should be stationed at that place until the spirit of hostility and unrest disappears from the Indian tribes.

In reply I beg to advise that upon reference of the matter to the commanding general of the division of the Pacific he reports that upon the Indian reservations of Oregon the Indians are actively engaged in civil pursuits, trying to make a living; that in his opinion there is no military necessity for the placing of troops on the Klamath reservation; and that he can not recommend the re-occupation of Fort Klamath, as in the case of formidable trouble there, the post would be of no use to the government. He adds that from the numerous reports received at the headquarters of that division of anticipated Indian troubles, it is problematical where an outbreak will occur, if anywhere, and that the alarming reports concerning the hostile demonstration by the Bannock Indians, have proven to be without foundation.

It may be added that the reservation is now with all appurtenances thereon under the control of the secretary of the interior.

Fort Klamath was the most beautiful frontier post that it was ever permitted a soldier to occupy. Historic interest, exquisite scenery and streams of crystal purity cast a charm over Fort Klamath which haunts a visitor to its solitude for many days after his departure. Though the soldier has left it in solitude, the eye quickens none the less at its charm. Abandoned, the buildings of Fort Klamath soon fell into ruin. Today a few of the old buildings still remain, uncared for and unoccupied, save by an occasional company of Indians from the reservation. About a mile from the buildings of old Fort Klamath stands the new Fort Klamath, a little village located in one of the most beautiful spots of Klamath county.

With the completion of the entire history of Fort Klamath we have taken several long strides ahead in the chronological order of our work. The year following the establishment of the fort, in the fall of 1864, there occurred an important event in the history of the county. This was a treaty with the Klamath and Modoc Indians and the creation of the Klamath reservation. Establishment of the fort had been for the protection of travel through such a hostile country and the encouragement of settlement. Naturally the next succeeding step to bring about the latter condition was a treaty with the Indians inhabiting the country. This was finally accomplished; the two tribes ceding all their lands to the government, except the reservation, on which the Indians were to live. This treaty was made October 14, 1864, at Council Grove near Fort Klamath, between Superintendent Huntington, of Oregon, A. E. Wiley, superintendent of California, by his deputy, Agent Logan, of Warm Springs reservation, Lindsay Applegate, and the Klamath, Modocs and Yahooskin band of Snakes. The military present were a detachment of Washington infantry under Lieutenant Halloran, W. C. McKay with five Indian scouts, Captain Kelly and Lieutenant Underwood, with a detachment of Company C. The Indians on the ground numbered 1,070, of whom 700 were Klamaths, over 300 Modocs and 20 Snakes, but more than 1,500 were represented. Huntington estimated that there were not more than 2,000 Indians in the country treated for, though Colonel Drew and E. Steele, of California, made a much higher estimate.

Special Agent Lindsay Applegate and McKay acted as counsellors and interpreters for the Indians. There was no difficulty in making a treaty with the Klamaths. The Modocs and Snakes were more reculant, but signed the treaty which they perfectly understood. It ceded all right to a tract of country extending from the 44th parallel on the north to the ridge which divides the Pit and McLeod rivers on the south, and from the Cascade mountains on the west to the Goose lake mountains on the east. The boundaries of the Indian reservation as defined in the treaty are as follows:

Beginning upon the eastern shore of middle Klamath lake at the point of rocks about twelve miles below the mouth of Williamson river; thence following up said eastern shore to the mouth of Wood river; thence up Wood river to a point one mile north of the bridge at Fort Klamath; thence due east to the summit of the ridge which divides the upper and middle Klamath lakes; thence along said ridge to a point due east (west) of the north end of the upper lake to the summit of the mountains on the east side of the lake; thence along said mountains to the point where Sprague river is intersected by Ish-tish-ia-wa creek; thence in a southerly direction to the summit of the mountain, the extremity of which forms the point of rocks; thence along said mountain to the place of beginning.

This tract contained, besides much country that was considered unfit for settlement, the Klamath marsh, which afforded a great food supply in roots, seeds, etc., a large extent of fine grazing land, with sufficient arable land to make farms for all the Indians and access to the fishery on Williamson river and the Great, or Upper Klamath lake. The Klamath reservation, as did every Indian reservation, if that on the Oregon coast was accepted, contained some of the choicest country and most agreeable scenery in the state. White persons, except government officers and employees, were by the terms of treaty forbidden to reside upon the reservation, while the Indians were equally bound to live upon it; the right of way for public roads only being pledged. The United States agreed to pay $8,000 per annum for five years, beginning when the treaty should be ratified; $5,000 for the next five years and $3,000 for the following five years; these sums to be expended under the direction of the president for the benefit of the Indians. The United States further agreed to pay $35,000 for such articles as should be furnished to the Indians at the time of signing the treaty, and for their subsistence, clothing and teams to begin farming for the first year. As soon as practicable after the ratification of the treaty, mills, shops and a school house were to be built. For 15 years a superintendent, a farmer, blacksmith, wagon maker, sawyer, and carpenter were to be furnished and two teachers for 22 years. The United States might cause the land to be surveyed in allotments, which might be secured to the families of the holders. The annuities of the tribes could not be taken for the debts of individuals. The United States might at any future time locate other Indians on the reservation, the parties to the treaty to lose no rights thereby.

On the part of the Indians they pledged themselves not to drink intoxicating liquors on pain of forfeiting their annuities; and to obey the laws of the United States, the treaty to be binding when ratified.

At this great council which was attended by nearly all the Indians in the basin, they asked the appointment of Lindsay Applegate as their agent, which appointment was made during the summer of 1865, and he repaired to Fort Klamath in October of that year with Oliver Applegate, his son, as clerk and interpreter, his only employee, and took charge of the Indians. The treaty had not yet been ratified by the United States senate and little could be done for the benefit of the people.

In May, 1866, the agent, with Lucien Applegate, Oliver Applegate, Samuel D. Whitmore and a man named Reed, with a wagon drawn by four yoke of oxen and laden with various articles for the beginning of agricultural operations on the reservation, came over the Cascades on the old emigrant road. They crossed Link river where the boom now is, at the head of the river, swimming the cattle and horses and ferrying the wagons and goods over in Indian canoes.

Knowing no way up the big lake except the rocky trail along the lake margin, they supposed they would have to make the circuit around Lost river gap and down Sprague river to reach the proposed site of Klamath agency, but a Link river Indian volunteered his services and piloted them directly through the mountains to Williamson river, the present road from Klamath Falls to Naylox being on the route traveled. At the "Point of Rocks," north of Naylox, they climbed to the summit of the mountain, thence along the summit and down the steep bluff to the ford on Williamson river, a few miles above the site of the present bridge. They christened the Indian guide Moses, for obvious reasons.

At this point in our history we divert for the purpose of giving the list of agents who have served at Klamath agency since the establishment of the reservation.

A gentleman named Rogers was the first agent, he having served from the time of the treaty until the appointment of Lindsav Applegate, in 1865. The latter served until 1869. Mr. Applegate was succeeded by O. C. Knapp, who continued in charge about one year. John Meacham was a special agent for a very short time. He was succeeded by L. S. Dyar who held the position for a number of years. Matthews was for a short time agent, and he was succeeded by E. L. Applegate who continued in charge about two years. L. S. Wilkenson was agent about eight years. The next succeeding agent was Joseph Emery, who was, in 1898, succeeded by Captain O. C. Applegate who remained in charge until May, 1905, when H. G. Wilson became agent.

Having established the Klamath Indian agency the Applegate party proceeded up Sprague river and located Yainax, as a sub-agency station for the benefit of the many Indians residing in the beautiful valley of that stream, being watched the entire distance by the wilder Snake and Piute Indians of Silver and Summer lakes, their signal fires being many times observed on the summits of the northern hills. Ivan Applegate was in charge of this sub-agency until the summer of 1871. With one white assistant he built a few log buildings, organized an Indian police force, fenced some land and raised a crop of grain the summer of 1870, with aid of the Indians. During the summer of 1871 about twenty log cabins were erected at the sub-agency for the Indians, and other improvements were made. O. C. Applegate took charge in 1871.

The main Klamath agency was established at Ko-was-ta, at the head of Klamath lake, May 12, 1866. A log cabin was erected and plowing at once began. Wheat, oats, rye and barley, with an assortment of the hardier vegetables, were successfully grown that season and the feasibility of field culture in the Klamath basin was demonstrated. The Indians entered into the spirit of the new proceedings with great zest and the field was fenced in a day with willows, sage brush and pine limbs, the interpreter, with thirty stalwart warriors doing the work. The next season rails were made, mostly by the Indians and several miles of substantial fence were made, much of which still stands as a memorial of those initial days of enterprise and improvement. And long after the establishment of the agency it was menaced by the Snake Indians, then on the warpath, and the little log buildings were hastily enclosed by a stockade and was for a portion of the time guarded by a detachment of troops from Fort Klamath. Vexatious delays attended the ratification of the Klamath and Modoc treaty, so that operations could not be commenced under it until the year 1867. In October of that year Superintendent Huntington undertook to lead in a band of beef cattle for the Indians, and several ox and horse teams laden with annuity goods, the first installment to come from The Dalles to Klamath agency, via the Warm Springs reservation. As the Snake war was yet in progress there was no little danger of the great train falling into the hands of Paulina, the war chief of the Oregon nomads. Mr. Huntington called upon the agent for assistance and he went at once to meet him with an escort of five regulars from Fort Klamath and Oliver Applegate, with his hastily organized company of Klamath scouts. Two of the principal chiefs were his lieutenants and the subordinates consisted of the most daring and active of the young warriors. This was called the "Axe and Rifle Company," as these men guarded the train through the hostile country and, going in advance through the dense black pine forests, between the Des Chutes and Klamath, cut out the way with their axes for the teams, mostly along the route of the old Indian trail. This great train in November encountered a snow storm in the Des Chutes country and for a hundred miles progress was difficult and trying.

At the period the original treaty with the Indians was made the reservation had not been surveyed, the boundaries being described by what were supposed to be well defined topographical features. This treaty was signed in 1864, accepted by the Indians and ratified by the government. But when a survey of the reservation was made it was found to be a difficult task to locate the boundaries; this led to complications which were not settled for many years after.

In 1870 the described line was surveyed by Mr. Mercer, of Corvallis. He submitted his map to the Indians at that time. They then claimed that he had not included all the land which they had supposed was reserved to them in the treaty. His survey cut off a portion of Sican valley and the whole upper portion of Sprague river valley. The Indians declared that all this country had been included in the tract reserved as they had agreed upon the boundary in making the treaty; but Mr. Mercer could not find it so in the treaty. The Indians then insisted that it was not written as they understood it; but the Mercer survey was accepted and ratified by the government. Thus the whole land business and settlement of Klamath county conformed to the survey as placed upon the records. The difference between Mercer's reading of the treaty and the version of the Indians is the question as to what point was to be considered the junction of "Ash-tish" creek and Sprague river. The treaty provided that from a point near the head of Klamath marsh the line should run to "the point where Sprague river is intersected by 'Ash-tish,' or Wax creek." Now this creek after emerging from its upper and mountainous course, spreads out, somewhat after the fashion of Lost river, over a wide, nearly level, marshy plain, which is called upper Sprague river valley, but does not intersect any other water course until it reaches what is called the middle fork of Sprague river. The surveyor ran a line to this, the first point of intersection with another stream that he could find, and maintained that he could not follow the directions and do otherwise. The Indians said they considered Ash-tish creek as ended where it reached the valley or plain, and that the stream thence onward was Sprague river; and they had intended to keep the whole of upper Sprague river valley. The treaty was written by Agent Huntington and the boundaries were described to him by the Indians through an interpreter. Neither he nor the witnesses to the treaty went over the line, and it is not surprising that opportunity was left for future disagreement. The description in the treaty was vague and indefinite, and the surveyor, Mercer, undoubtedly interpreted it conscientiously and properly.

Thus the matter rested for many years. The Indians were dissatisfied with the survey of 1870 and believed that they were entitled to the whole of Upper Sprague river valley, as they understood the treaty of 1864. The government having accepted the Mercer survey of 1870, leaving out of the reservation the rich lands of upper Sprague river valley, this land was settled upon by whites and patents to the lands were issued by the government.

At last efforts were made to effect a settlement of the perplexing question. As the representative of the Indians Mr. Ivan Applegate went to Washington, D. C., where he succeeded in having action taken. It was during the second administration of Grover Cleveland that congress authorized the appointment of a commission to investigate and report the claims of the Indians. This commission was composed of William C. Coleman, of Missouri, Richard R. P. Hammond, of California and Ivan Applegate, of Oregon.

Upon investigating the case in all its details the commission found that the treaty provided for the whole of Sprague river valley to be included in the reservation; that according to the later surveys a large portion of that valley had been left out and had been settled by whites; that between 500,000 and 600,000 acres of land had thus been denied the rightful owners, the Indians. The commission fixed a value of about 78 cents per acre on the land and recommended that an appropriation be granted the Indians in payment. The report was accepted, but up to the present time the appropriation has not been granted by congress, although attempts to pass such a bill are made at nearly every session.

The Klamath and Modoc Indians of the Klamath reservation all dress as whites, wear their hair short and are well advanced in civilization. While they are not what might be termed fully civilized, the elements of progress are well grounded and steadily developing among them. A stranger riding through the district would never suspect that he was passing through an Indian settlement. Commodious residences, good barns, extensive stock pastures and hay meadows, stacks of hay and good fences, with what little live stock they have in fine condition, show general prosperity and give it the appearance of a community of prosperous white pioneers, instead of being among the Klamath and Modoc Indians, some of whom were hostiles of the "Lava Beds" troubles of 1872 and 1873.

With the exception of the very old people these Indians are fairly well educated, a majority of them being well advanced, and of the 200 whose signatures were attached to an agreement with the government in 1900, 95 signed their own names. All appear to understand English, and most of them, both men and women, speak the English language quite intelligently and without native accent so common to most tribes.

The Klamath Indians, in customs, education and business ability, are superior to most of the American tribes and are surpassed by none. Contrast the Klamaths with the blanketed, long-haired Sioux or any of the several branches of that tribe. The Klamaths are far in advance of them.

The government has taken good care of its wards on the Klamath reservation. At the agency is maintained one of the most promising Indian schools in the service, having an average attendance of about 125 pupils. As shown by statistics it stands only second to the Chemawa Training school, or Harrison Institute, near Salem, among the several Indian schools of Oregon, and is a permanent institution. The school buildings alone represent a valuation of not less than $30,000. Besides the school there are several other institutions at the agency for the benefit of the Indians. Early in the present decade congress appropriated $11,000 for improvements at the agency. Of this amount $5,700 was for a system of water works; $2,100 for sewers, and $3,200 for electric lighting.

FROM EARLY SETTLEMENT TO MODOC WAR

We have now advanced to the primal settlement of Klamath county. Prior to the Indian treaty no thought of permanent settlement in the country had entered the mind of any one. To a few people only was the country known—those who had come from the far western settlements to pilot immigrants across the mountains and protect them from Indians; a few trappers and traders; two or three men who had had the courage to graze stock upon the range; and a small force of troops under Colonel Drew who had made an exploration of the country. But with the establishment of the military post and the resultant knowledge gained of the country, a few stalwart pioneers ventured to build homes and wrest a heritage from the wilderness. But this early settlement was not accomplished without great danger, privations and hardships. Few and far between were the settlers; surrounded by wild beasts and wilder men, deprived of all life's comforts and the conveniences of social life; they joined determinedly in the struggle with material things. But to these pioneers the swamp and sage plains of Klamath county presented a scene at once picturesque, but unpromising, except for the sole industry of stock raising. The natural meadows afforded sustenance for winter, and the bunch grass hills were the almost limitless pastures where their cattle flourished and fattened.

Thus the Klamath country for so many years passed by with indifference; considered fit for nothing but savage Modocs, sage brush, coyotes and jack-rabbits, was discovered to be valuable as a stock raising country. One by one the pioneers ventured in here and thus satisfied the more timid that this was indeed a fair and goodly land—that in addition to being a good stock, it was a farming country as well. But this latter fact was not demonstrated until many years later.

The honor of being the first permanent settler in Klamath county undoubtedly belongs to Wendolen Nus, who was later killed in the Modoc War. We have related the experiences of Mr. Nus during the winter of 1858-9, in the Klamath country, and of his subsequent removal to the John Day mines. In 1866 Mr. Nus returned to the Klamath basin. With him he brought a band of cattle. He located on the west side of Klamath lake at a point about three miles north of the present town of Klamath Falls. Here he built a cabin, did some fencing and passed the winter of 1866-7. That winter he furnished beef for the fort. In 1867 he took up a place on the east bank of Klamath river, about two miles below the present site of Klamath Falls. Here he built a cabin and ran a ferry across the Klamath river.

In April, 1867, two soldiers stationed at the fort, First Sergeant O. A. Stearns and Lewellyn Colver, of Company I, First Oregon Infantry, selected land in the Klamath country upon which to settle so soon as they were mustered out of the service. This occurred in July, of that year, at Jacksonville, and they at once returned to their new homes. The holdings by them selected were state lands on the west side of Klamath river, seven miles southwest of the present town of Klamath Falls. Messrs. Stearns and Colver formed a partnership which was maintained for several years. They built one cabin and laid the foundation for homes. Being without means they were obliged to work out a portion of each year in order to secure a "grub-stake" to start them in the stock-raising business.

O. T. Brown, who had been at the fort for some time previous, accompanied Stearns and Colver in their search for land, and about the same time located on Spencer creek. Mrs. Brown accompanied her husband and was the first white woman to make her home in the Klamath country.

Arthur Langell was a settler of 1867. He located upon the Hot Springs property, just east of the present town of Klamath Falls. Later he sold this property and moved to the valley which now bears his name.

Another settler of 1867 was Dennis Crawley who settled on land on the west side of Klamath river near the O. A. Stearn's place. H. M. Thatcher, who was a school teacher living in the settlements west of the mountains, was a partner of Mr. Crawley and came out the following year. He took land adjoining his partner. Being of small means these two men decided to economize in the matter of buildings and so only one cabin was erected, and that was on Mr. Crawley's claim. They put in a crop of grain, their intention being to supply grain for Fort Klamath. Their venture resulted in failure; their partnership was dissolved, and each member settled at different points in the county.

C. C. Bailey, in the same year, settled on the present site of Maylox, the place then being known as Humming Bird Spring.

Another settler of 1867 was A. J. Burnette, who took up his place of residence on the east side of the lower end of Upper Klamath lake. William Hicks, also, came to the country this year and was employed by Mr. Langell on his place at the Hot Springs.

The crowning event of the year 1867 was the founding of the town of Linkville, on Link river; the present town of Klamath Falls. The creation of the town at this time was not effected with loud whoops and a brass band. Possibly it is stretching a point to say that the town was "founded" at all. But we will accept the benefit of the doubt and say that Linkville was founded in 1867. At all events a cabin was built here by George Nurse and Edgar Overton, and within the cabin was a store consisting of the remnants of Mr. Nurse's sutler's stock at Fort Klamath. The entire assortment could, probably, have been loaded on a buckboard. It consisted of trinkets which caught the Indian's eye; tobacco which was more to the liking of the white man; and a few other articles generally found in a frontier sutler's store. As we shall in a later chapter tell of the subsequent history of this town, let us pass it here with this brief mention.

Thus we find at the close of 1867, where at the beginning there was only one settler, a town with something less than a dozen people and a few scattered settlers living in the Klamath country, aside from the soldiers at Fort Klamath. The year 1868 witnessed the arrival of quite a number of new settlers in the Klamath country. These, as did those of the preceding year, came with a view of making permanent homes for themselves and families. Being quite doubtful of the practicability of successful farming, they gave their more serious attention to the raising of horses and cattle.

From the general character of the soil it soon appeared to the casual observer that crops might be grown, barring the doubt entertained of the effect of severe winters and early frosts. However, the human family is endowed with an experimental temperament, and these hardy pioneers had unlimited possession of it.

The subsequent four or five years determined the fact that grain by careful and expedient cultivation could be grown with moderate success in about four particular localities, viz: the John H. Miller and O. A. Stearns' places, near Keno; the Reames & Martin place, near Linkville and the A. J. Burnette place on the eastern shore of Klamath lake. Grain at that time sold readily at three, four and five cents per pound. Around these four small farms centralized the thought and experiment of the entire community in harmony with the owners who performed the manual labor, the desire of the consumers being to avoid transportation of this much needed article over a rugged, rocky, rough and mountainous road from Rogue River valley on wagons drawn by horses and mules. These places were located on the shores of Little Klamath lake, or swamp surrounding the lake, immediately adjacent to the natural swamp grasses used for hay; the lands in their wild state being covered with small brush and weeds—not the variety commonly known as sage brush land of which the county is mostly composed, but rather the intermediate between swamp and sage brush land.

These supposed favored localities were taxed to their limited capacities in an effort to supply the demand of a rapidly increasing stock country which was being populated by migratory herds from every county and state on the Pacific coast for the purpose of gaining free access to the bunch grass that carpeted the hills and plains. The stockmen were reclining at their ease, reaping handsome profits from their fat herds of cattle and horses. A very large percentage of the revenue derived from the sale of stock was expended in Rogue River valley for flour, vegetables, fruits and other necessaries of life. So commonly was the settler seen on the road after supplies that the lookers-on facetiously remarked, "There goes another sage-brusher down to Egypt after corn."

In 1868 Messrs. Coultas and Kuhn, with their wives, settled in the Klamath basin. These ladies were the second and third white women to become residents of Klamath county. In 1868 J. T. Fulkerson and Mr. Harris took up homes about ten miles southwest of Linkville where they built cabins. Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Fulkerson were also, among the first white women to locate in the county. Steven Stukel, still a resident of Klamath county, settled two and one-half miles east of Klamath Falls, on what is now known as the Mitchell place, in 1868. He made his home there until 1878 when he moved to the Merrill neighborhood. In the fall of 1868 a Mr. Miller accompanied by his three sons, John H., William and Warren settled on land on Little Klamath lake on what is now known as the Downing ranch. Robert Whittle, who for several years previously had annually come from Yreka up to the Klamath river where Keno is now situated, to catch fish which he took back to Yreka to sell, in 1868 with his son-in-law, Francis Picard, built a cabin and the two became residents of Klamath county. Joseph Conger also came in 1868, and worked for George Nurse at Linkville for several years. Two other settlers of this year were John Corbell and John Scheffbauer, who bought the Hot Springs property of Arthur Langell.

The year 1868 was, also, fraught with other events of importance. A sawmill was then established in the territory now embraced by Klamath county. It was located on Spencer creek by Granville Naylor and John Hockenyoss. For ten years it continued to saw lumber for the settlers of southern Oregon and northern California. In 1871 this property was purchased by E. Spencer. This mill was quite a primitive one, but it answered well the demands of that primitive period. Nearly all of the buildings in Klamath county in the earlier days were erected from lumber sawed at this mill.

More settlers came in 1869. At the close of that year there were, possibly, 100 people living within the boundaries of the present Klamath county. This settlement of 1869 was due, largely, to the ending of the Snake Indian war following the successful campaign of General Crook. To Goose lake valley there was quite an immigration that year, and as the route was through the Klamath county territory, many, being satisfied with the country, stopped off and settled. Among the new comers this year were George S. Miller, who drove in a band of cattle and located at Lost river gap; Thomas J. Brattain, who settled near Linkville that year and moved to the Bonanza neighborhood the following season; William J. Horton, Amon Shook, and several sons who located near the Stearns ranch; Francis Smith, Edward Penning and John S. Shook who took claims in, and named Alkali, (now Yonna) valley; Benjamin Hall and a small party who found homes in Lankell's valley; Jacob Thompson, Jesse D. Walker, who located on the west side of Klamath river near Keno; Mr. Whitney who built the bridge at Linkville; Judson Small, Dennis Small, A. F. Woodruff, Joseph Campbell, Silas Kilgore and George Thomas, all of whom located southwest of Linkville.

It was in 1869 that the few settlers who had made homes in the Klamath country began to discuss seriously the question of a road through their particular section of the country. The road from Fort Klamath to the towns west of the mountains was of no benefit whatever to those who had settled in the southern portion of the county. The members of the county court of Jackson county were not, at first, inclined to grant the petition of the settlers east of the mountains for a county road. Through a country so sparsely settled the court could not see the wisdom of building a roadway. But, eventually, after two of the settlers had furnished a bond for $1,000 to cover expenses in case it was not found practicable to lay out the road, they dispatched a surveyor to the Klamath country. He made a favorable report and laid out the road. This was all the settlers wanted; they constructed the highway. It wound up along the Klamath river; thence to Lost river and down that stream to the Stukel place; thence down the east side of Tule lake to the state line.

Another event of this year was the survey of a railway route across the county. In the Klamath Falls Express of April 20, 1893, Mr. D. B. Worthington, who was a member of the surveying party, said of this incident:

We call attention to the fact, though forgotten no doubt by many, that Hon. Jesse D. Applegate made a preliminary survey across the Cascades in 1869, which penetrated Klamath county.

Applegate's line commenced near the old James Miller place on Little Butte, following the same toward its head in the Cascades to Fish lake; thence southeast to Lost Prairie; thence on nearly the same course across the main summit to Buck lake; thence in a more easterly direction to Aspen lake; thence easterly to the Klamath river, and crossing the same at the old Nus ferry, about three miles below Klamath Falls; thence in a southwesterly course to the Oregon and California line.

Our information in this matter is not borrowed, as ye scribe (D. B. Worthington), was one of the chain bearers on that memorable expedition, and the scenes and incidents occurring along the virgin line are yet quite vivid in our memory, notwithstanding the intervention of many years. This route proved to be exceedingly rough in places, especially along Butte Creek and its head tributaries, abounding in brush, rocks and heavy timber, until we reached the neighborhood of Lost Prairie. Then the woods became more open and rocky, precipitous gorges and cliffs less frequent. From there on we had no great difficulty in running several miles each day, and on reaching the Klamath basin we had plain sailing until we suddenly and quite unexpectedly ran into Captain Jack's camp on Lost river, near the old Bybee & Colwell stock ranch. Here our further progress was questioned by his highness, Captain Jack, who informed us through his interpreter, Scarface Charley, that he did not desire his dominion should be surveyed, as he had no intention of joining the "Bostons" in agricultural pursuits.

When made to understand that the survey was not being made for that particular purpose, but for a line of railroad, he was still obstinate (one of his noted peculiarities) and said that he did not want a railroad; his ponies being good enough for him and his people. After a talk which lasted nearly through the night, costing the outfit all the tobacco it possessed and nearly everything eatable, he told us we had his permission to proceed to our objective point, the state line, but not to linger, as his people were "Hiyu sullix copa Boston" (angry at the whites) and he would not hold himself responsible for any loss of life or property which we might suffer at their hands. As the redoubtable captain looked very much in earnest while he was saying this, we were not inclined to doubt him in the least. On the following day we connected with the state line and returned at "double quick" to Linkville with feelings of considerable relief that we were well out of a bad scrape.

To the best of our recollection this survey was made at the instigation of a party of wealthy and prominent men of Oregon, to test the feasibility of a railroad line from Rogue river valley across the Cascades to the Klamath basin. The route following the Applegate survey is altogether practicable, though exceedingly rough in the vicinity of Little Butte; but a rough surface in building railroads does not cut any very great figure so long as a sufficiently easy grade can be obtained.

Some definite idea of the population of Klamath county in 1870 may be gained from the fact that at the election in June of that year there were cast in the precinct of Jackson, lying east of the mountains, including the present Lake and Klamath counties, 32 votes.

During the three years preceding the outbreak of the Modoc War, 1870, '71 and '72, settlement was quite vigorous, although when the war came there were not to exceed 400 men, women and children, possibly not over 250, in what is now Klamath county. Data is not available to give the names of all these settlers, but a few who lived in the county for many years and became closely identified with the county's history in after years have been brought to our notice. In 1870 came J. P. Roberts, James Taylor, Joseph Sweigle and Benjamin Stout. In 1871 W. M. Roberts, John Gleim, J. F. Arant and Henry C. Duncan. The year 1872 brought George McDonald, Daniel Colwell, Isaac Wilson, John Loosley, Michael Hartery, J. F. Adams, Thomas Wilson, I. P. Chandler and W. F. Arant.

Prior to the spring of 1872, although the Klamath country was settled to a considerable extent, there had been no mail facilities. The troops at the fort secured their mail from Henley, California, on the west side of the mountain, a soldier making the trip once every two weeks. The settlers got their mail as best they could. But in the spring of 1872 the government was prevailed upon to grant a mail route into the interior country, and a contract for carrying the mail was let. The route was from Ashland, Oregon, to Lake City, California, via Linkville. At the latter town a postoffice was established with George Nurse as postmaster. Later another office was opened at Merganser, of which J. P. Roberts was postmaster.

The contract for delivering over this route was let to Mr. Kilgore, of Ashland, for between $4,000 and $5,000 a year. Weekly trips were made, the mails being carried by Mr. Kilgore and his sons; sometimes on horseback; often in a light vehicle, and occasionally they carried the mail sacks afoot on their backs. This contract was held by Mr. Kilgore three years.

In 1875 Garrett & Hatton were awarded the contract to convey the mails, subletting the route from Linkville to Lake City to John McCurdy. Then they turned their attention and energies toward building up a first-class, old time stage-route between the two first named points. The terms of the contract called for semi-weekly trips from Ashland to Linkville, which continued until the expiration of the first two years. Receiving nearly all the government passenger traffic to and from Fort Klamath, which was heavily garrisoned at that period, and as the Klamath country was beginning to be rapidly settled up, the staging business increased accordingly. Two-horse stock and light wagons failing to accommodate the general public, regular Concord coach, four and six-horse stock, was substituted at great expense, and the service increased to daily trips, running the original contract price up to $17,000 per year, which continued until the expiration of their contract. During the four years' service they lost only one trip.

THE MODOC WAR.

In previous chapters we have told of the stirring events in the Klamath country—which is now the political division known as Klamath county—from the date of the first visit of white men up to the opening of the Modoc War. It remains to detail the tragic incidents of this short, but desperate struggle between a few score of the Modoc Indians, under the leadership of Captain Jack, and the United States troops and Oregon volunteers.

But at the outset let us consider the status of the Klamath country at the date of the outbreak in the fall of 1872. Within the present boundaries of Klamath county at that period were living between 300 and 400 white people—stock raisers, mainly, in Lost river, Tule lake and Langell's valleys, on Link river, and one or two on Sprague river. Within this county were two small trading points; Linkville on the present site of Klamath Falls, and Merganser, on the east bank of the river, two or three miles below Linkville. Each of these towns boasted of a store and two or three other business houses, which catered to the trade of the settlers in the Klamath country. To the north of these settlements, from 40 to 60 miles was Fort Klamath, garrisoned by a small body of troops. On the Klamath reservation lived the Klamath Indians and portions of a few other tribes who, according to the treaty of 1864, had agreed to live there. The Modocs, in defiance of the treaty, occupied the old lands and laid claim to them, levying tribute on the settlers who wished to make homes there.

The war broke out in November, 1872. Under Captain Jack the Modocs swept through the settlements of Lost river and Tule lake valleys, murdered the white inhabitants, destroyed homes and, retiring into the impregnable recesses of the lava beds of Northern California, bade defiance to the combined forces of all the United States troops in the country, and several companies of volunteer troops from Oregon and California for nearly a year. A trail of blood, ashes and tears was left from Linkville to the lava beds; terror entered the hearts of every settler in the Klamath country. One of the fiercest Indian wars ever fought, it attracted world-wide attention.

During the progress of this war, covering a period of less than a year, nearly as many were killed—soldiers, volunteers and citizens—as were lost in battle on the American side during the Spanish-American war. The money expended in this outbreak by the United States was more than $4,000,000.

Briefly the primal causes of the Modoc War was the refusal of this tribe of Indians to live on the Klamath reservation, as provided by treaty, and the attempt of the government to force them to do so.

The main incidents leading up to the breaking out of hostilities are told in an official communication from Brigadier General Edward R. S. Conby, commanding the department of the Columbia, to the assistant adjutant general of the military division of the Pacific, dated Portland, February 7, 1872. This communication in part was:

The treaty with the Klamaths, Modocs and Yahooskin Snakes, was made on the 14th of October, 1864, and approved by the senate with certain amendments on the second of July, 1866, but not finally ratified until the 10th of December, 1869. This long delay made the Indians who were parties to the treaty very suspicious, and I have been informed by the superintendent that when the treaty, as amended by the senate, was interpreted and explained to them, Captain Jack, the present leader of the troublesome Modocs, protested that it did not represent what they had agreed to. He was, however, convinced by the testimony of the other chiefs, and finally assented to it. When they were established on the reservation they went to work with a good deal of interest to build cabins and enclose ground for cultivation, but were so much annoyed by the Klamaths that they complained to the local agent, who instead of protecting them in their rights, endeavored to compromise the difficulty by removing them to another location. At this point the same difficulties recurred, and a third selection was made. The Modocs then abandoned the reservation, alleging that the last point selected was a trap to place them in the power of their enemies, the Klamaths.

These changes were made without the concurrence of the superintendent, and I believe did not come to his knowledge until after the Modocs had fled from the reservation. All subsequent attempts to induce them to return have failed.

In the summer of last year, and in consequence of complaints against these Indians, the superintendent sent commissioners to confer with them, who authorized the Modocs to remain where they were until the superintendent could see them. This has been understood as a settlement of the question until some permanent arrangement could be made for them; and unless they have violated some subsequent agreement, I do not think that the immediate application of force, as asked for, would be either expedient or just. They should, at least, be notified that a new location has been selected for them and provision made for their wants. They should, also, be allowed a reasonable and definite time to remove their families and fully warned that their refusal or failure to remove to the reservation within the appointed time would be followed by such measures as may be necessary to compel them. I am not surprised at the unwillingness of the Modocs to return to any point of the reservation where they would be exposed to the hostilities and annoyances they have heretofore experienced (and without adequate protection) from the Klamaths, but they have expressed a desire to be established upon Lost river, where they would be free from this trouble, and the superintendent informed me last summer that he would endeavor to secure such a location for them.

In no other respects are the Modocs entitled to much consideration, and although many of the complaints against them have been found to be greatly exaggerated, they are, without being absolutely hostile, sufficiently troublesome to keep up a constant feeling of apprehension among the settlers.

As stated in General Canby's report the Modocs were taken upon the reservation where they remained only a short period when they again left and went to their chosen home on Lost river. It was in January, 1870, when Superintendent A. B. Meacham succeeded in removing them to the reservation. The story of the accomplishment of this deed is worth preserving. The party that entered upon this mission were Superintendent of Indian Affairs A. B. Meacham; O. C. Knapp, agent of the Klamath reservation; W. C. McKay, the noted scout, and Ivan Applegate, then in charge of the Yaimix agency. They assembled at Linkville and preparations were made to go to the Modoc camp, on Lost river, to confer with Captain Jack's band. A messenger was dispatched to Jack, who returned word that he did not recognize their authority and that he would not confer. However, they went to his camp. As a matter of precaution a detachment of soldiers, fourteen strong, in command of Sergeant Beard, were brought down from Fort Klamath to Linkville. Here they were ordered to remain while the party under Meacham went to the Modoc camp.

The latter party, accompanied by Silas Kilgore, of Linkville, as teamster, and Chief Henry Blowe and "Jim" Parker, Indian interpreters, with their squaws, proceeded to the Indian camp where they met Jack's party in conference. As usual Captain Jack was haughty and refused to go upon the reservation. He produced letters from white men of Yreka advising him to remain where he was. It appeared as if the efforts of the Meacham party would prove unavailing. Such was the condition when a very unexpected event occurred—unexpected to both the Indians and the commissioner's party.

It was after dark; the party of white men noted a commotion in camp. Men and women were gesticulating wildly; the whole party was thrown into the greatest excitement. The camp was panic stricken. Some of the warriors bolted the camp; the greater portion remained a disorganized mob. This is what had happened: The thirteen soldiers under Sergeant Beard, who had been left at Linkville, had immediately upon the departure of Mr. Meacham's party, proceeded to fill up on Linkville liquor. Before night they were in a condition to imagine that all sorts of tragedies were being enacted at the Modoc camp, in which the Meacham party was being massacred and greatly in need of assistance. With Sergeant Beard to imagine was to act. With his thirteen followers he set out on a lope for the Indian country. It was dark when they gained the camp and surprised the Modocs and the commissioner's party. Throwing his command into a line of skirmishers Beard advanced. The Indians, not being able to distinguish the number of soldiers, and imagining that they were confronted by the advance guard of an army, became panic-stricken and utterly demoralized.

Having been unable to accomplish anything before, Superintendent Meacham decided to take advantage of the unexpected arrival of the soldiers and the excitement of the Indians. Agent Knapp assumed charge of the fourteen men, and so disposed them as to surround the camp. Then, with some of the warriors, the women and children, he proceeded to Link river where they went into camp. Captain Jack, with seventeen men, had escaped and gone to his stronghold in the lava beds, a thing which he did subsequently; but when the women and children were not in custody, as we shall show later, Captain Jack and his following of seventeen not wishing to desert the women, soon came in to Linkville and gave themselves up. His whole band was removed to the Klamath reservation peaceably. Here they remained only a short time, soon taking up their residence on Lost river.

During the closing days of 1871 and the beginning of 1872 the Modocs became arrogant and numerous complaints were made of depredations upon the Klamath county settlers. Among others molested was J. M. True, who resided on Lost river. The Indians knocked down the fence surrounding his haystack and turned in their cayuses to his winter feed. They also carried off some of the hay to their own tepees. This they did on several occasions. Other settlers were, also, annoyed by Indian thievery. Several household utensils were stolen from Mr. Doten and some halters from Mr. Whitney. From Mr. True the Modocs demanded money. Captain Jack threatened the lives of several white men, among others Messrs. Ball and Blair who lived near Lost river. These facts were sworn to in an affidavit made by Mr. True, January 3, 1872.

Conditions had become serious. The Indians grew daily more and more arrogant and overbearing in their behavior. Their threats to kill and burn, together with their numerous depredations, alarmed the settlers of the Klamath country. Many sent their families west of the Cascade mountains for safety. Those who did not very shortly regretted it. Apparently the government was making no effort to better the condition of the settlers, and this led to a strong petition signed by forty-four residents, which was forwarded to the military authorities and to the department of Indian affairs, asking that steps be at once taken to remove the Modocs to the reservation. Following is the petition of the citizens of the Klamath country to A. B. Meacham, superintendent of Indian affairs, and General Canby, commanding the department of the Columbia, presented in January, 1872:

Hon. A. B. Meacham,

Superintendent of Indian Affairs:

General Canby,

Commanding Department of the Columbia:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Lost and Link rivers, Klamath and Tule lake country, after suffering years of annoyance from the presence of the Modoc Indians, who, through the delay of the Indian and Military departments, have not been removed to the reservation as required by the treaty stipulations of 1864, entered into by the authorized agents of the government and the chiefs of the Modoc Indians, by which all their lands were ceded to the United States except those embraced in the reservation, as stipulated in said treaty; but notwithstanding all the conditions of said treaty have been faithfully performed on the part of the government, it is a well known fact that a factious band of the Modocs of about 300 who were parties to that treaty have, through the influence of citizens of an adjoining state, who have been engaged in an illicit traffic with them, instigated to set the authority of the government at defiance, and to utterly refuse compliance with their treaty stipulations, by not going on the reservation; and since there is no longer any conflict between the Indian and military department, such as prevented Sub-Agent Applegate from bringing these Indians on the reservation, we therefore make this earnest appeal to you for relief, knowing that you have the cavalry force we petitioned to be sent to Fort Klamath two years ago for this specific purpose at your command.

We ask you to use for the purpose for which it was procured, that the departments, both civil and military, have not been kept ignorant of the fact that we have been repeatedly on the verge of a desolating Indian war with this band of outlaws, who, by your delay to enforce the treaty, have been led to despise rather than to respect the authority of the government. Their long continued success in defying its authorities has emboldened them in their defiant and hostile bearing until further forbearance on our part would cease to be a virtue; that in many instances our families have become alarmed at their threats to kill and burn, until we were compelled to remove them for safety across the Cascade mountains, thereby suffering great loss of time and property. That the agent at Klamath and commissary at Yainix, during this long delay growing out of this unfortunate conflict of departments, have done all they could to prevent a war, and bring about an amicable adjustment of our troubles we have no reason to doubt; but we ask now, since no such conflict exists, shall a petty Indian chief, with twenty desperadoes and a squalid band of three hundred miserable savages any longer set at defiance the strong arm of the government, driving our citizens from their homes, threatening their lives, and destroying their property?

Their removal to the reservation in the winter season may be easily accomplished by any one acquainted with them and their country, and will not require more force than can be furnished from Fort Klamath. We recommend Com. A. (I.) D. Applegate, of Yainix, to the consideration of the department as a suitable man to take charge of any force or expedition to their removal. His long connection with the Indian Department, and thorough knowledge of them and their country, and all facts connected with the whole Modoc question, and as a stock raiser equally interested with us in their removal, point him out to us as the right man in the right place, in charge of this much needed expedition for the removal of the band of Modocs to their reservation, for which we, your petitioners, will ever pray.

The condition of affairs at this time is plainly set forth in a letter written by Jesse Applegate on February 1, 1872, to A. B. Meacham, superintendent of Indian affairs. Mr. Applegate's letter in part was as follows:

Having broken away from the reservation in defiance of the agent and the military, and conciliatory means alone resorted to to induce them to return, they (the Modocs) have misunderstood your forbearance and humanity, and think your policy dictated by weakness and fear, and the impunity with which they commit aggressions and levy "blackmail" upon the settlers, encourages and confirms that belief.

From advices from that quarter, their arrogance and impudence have been greater than ever before, and the patience and forbearance of the settlers most inclined to peace is well nigh exhausted.

The Indians help themselves to what they want when by intimidation they fail to obtain permission. Instead of a more friendly feeling growing up between the races, the hatred of one and the assurance of the other is by this conduct continually intensified, and open hostilities may any day commence between them. This state of affairs discourages new settlers, and keeps those in the country in a feverish state of uneasiness and alarm, and instead of their increased numbers driving the Indians into better behavior, the number of Indians are constantly recruited by the bad and discontented flung to them from the neighboring reservations, and they being concentrated in a body, they actually hold the settlements on Lost and Link rivers at their mercy, and being perfectly aware of the fact, they use it to their own advantage.

But at last the military authorities took action for the protection of the settlers. February 16, 1872, orders were issued from the headquarters of the Department of the Columbia, at Portland, to the commanding officer of the district of the lakes, at Camp Warner, to establish a force of fifty or sixty cavalymen at some point in the threatened country with a view of giving protection to the settlers. These troops were to be taken in nearly equal proportions from Fort Klamath and Camp Warner, and Yainix Station on Sprague river, was suggested as a suitable place from which to operate. This order was not intended as a demonstration of war, as the following paragraph in the letter of instructions will show:

"You will be careful to impress upon the commanding officer that the object in view is not to make war upon the Modocs, but if possible to avert war by preventing collisions between them and the settlers, and taking such other measures as may be necessary to keep the peace and secure the settlers from depredations and hostilities. *

* * But if hostilities should actually be commenced or be inevitable, the most prompt and energetic measures must be adopted to suppress and punish them, and to this end all the resources in men and material at the posts in the district of the lakes will be at your disposal."

During this time the question of selecting a new location for the Modocs was being duly considered by the commissioner of Indian affairs at Washington, D. C. Owing to the inability of the Modocs and Klamaths to live peaceably on the Klamath reservation, it appeared desirable to some that a new location should be secured for the Modocs. This plan had been suggested by Superintendent A. B. Meacham to the department at Washington, he having recommended that a small reservation be made for the Modocs at the north end of Tule lake, but no action was taken by the department along that line.

The fact that no action was taken by the government toward granting a new reservation for the Modocs cannot, by any possibility, be construed as a mistake on its part. By treaty the Modoc Indians had agreed to live on the reservation, and had ceded their Lost river lands to the United States; the greater portion of them were willing to remain on the reservation. Here were the conditions: Captain Jack, who represented only the worst element of the tribe and whose au-authority as chief of the Modocs the government did not recognize, had taken a small part of the tribe and, in defiance of the treaty, was assuming control, and ownership of a country in which he had no right to live. With this cut-throat element of the Modocs he wanted a reservation in the heart of a country which was settled by whites with no protection against the lawless deeds of the Indians. Had a reservation been granted them on Lost river conditions would have remained the same as we find at this date, and the settlers would have lived in constant fear of attack and would have been obliged to suffer from their thievery and threats. Aside from these conditions the effect on other Indians would have proved unfavorable. They would have seen that a treaty was not to be considered binding and that when they desired to repudiate it and secure a new location, all they would have to do would be to leave; intimidate all the settlers in the country to which they moved; commit a few depredations and the government, fearful of an outbreak, would readily grant them all they asked.

We desire to state here positively that the plan of granting a new reservation to the Modocs was an impossibility. In our opinion if any error was committed by the authorities during and preceding the Modoc war, it was not in refusing to grant the reservation on Lost river.

We have previously stated that the cause of the Modoc war was the refusal of these Indians to live upon the Klamath reservation, coupled with the attempt of military authorities to remove them. To everyone that fact was patent. But the Modoc war would never have broken out had there not been another cause—a cause which it is necessary to detail in order that a faithful history may be presented. This was the relation existing between the Modocs and certain residents of California, notably those of Yreka. For many years while the Modocs were living on the lands of Lost river all their trade and business relations had been with the people of that California town. Many of the Modoc squaws had become wives of white men of Yreka. The Indians were treated fairly by Yreka people, and through long intercourse had come to look upon them as friends and advisors.

Such were the actual conditions when the Modocs became dissatisfied with their treaty obligations and refused to live on Klamath reservation. Had it not been for the advice of their Yreka friends they would have been easily persuaded to do so, and there would have been no Modoc War.

At the several times when attempts were made to get the Captain Jack band of Indians to go back, this advice from Yreka was each time encountered, and it balked the efforts of the superintendent of Indian affairs in the accomplishment of his mission. Practically this advice from Yreka to Captain Jack was: "We are your friends and will stay by you. The Oregon officers have no authority over you. Stay where you are on your Lost river lands and we will see that you are not removed, but that your homes shall be there forever."

These statements are not from hearsay evidence, but are made from letters which were turned over by Captain Jack when efforts were made to remove him. This advice did not come from irresponsible parties, but from men of high standing at Yreka. However, there can be only one explanation for such advice—selfishness. Had the Modocs been removed to the reservation Yreka would have been deprived of a profitable trade with the band. These Yreka men knew of the treaty of 1864 and that the Modoc Indians had no legal or moral right to the lands on Lost river.

So when attempts were made to remove Captain Jack's band the commissioner was met by a haughty chief. "My white friends tell me to stay here," argued Jack. "You of Oregon have no authority over me. I shall never go to the reservation." Without this advice and promised support from Yreka these Indians would have been placed on the reservation with very little difficulty and the Modoc war would have been averted.

Along the same lines was the part taken by the large stockmen just over the line in California. It is the history of the west that stockmen have always discouraged settlement by farmers, and these large stockowners of Northern California, who ranged their cattle up into the present Klamath country, did not wish to see the country settled. Their influence was thrown to the side of the Indians in their contentions for their old lands on Lost river.

This California influence was apparent throughout the war and the several propositions to grant the Modocs a reservation on Lost river were considered by the Washington authorities originated in Yreka, California. That this regrettable stand taken by Yreka parties resulted in a prolongation of the war, as well as being the actual cause of it, is apparent. Through it, and the first reports of the war sent out to the world from Yreka, a decidedly wrong idea was conveyed. These reports were wired by people who were interested in retaining the trade of the Modocs, and were all prepared from the Indian point of view. In fact, the correspondents at Yreka at the outset, had no data from which to write their stories except that as told by the Indians themselves. Because of this the reading public did (and were justified in doing so) believe that the Modocs were a much abused people and were fighting for a principle much the same as our forefathers did in the War of the Revolution. Influence from all parts of the country was brought to bear on the authorities to grant the Modocs a reservation on Lost river. So strong was it that this was nearly done, despite the better judgment of the authorities. No greater mistake could have been made.

In February, 1872, Superintendent Meacham suggested to General Canby that either Linkville or Langell's valley would be a more eligible point for the cavalry to operate from than the other suggested point, Yainix. Either of these two places was only four or five hours' ride from the Modoc camp, and with no mountains between, while Yainix was some 50 or 60 miles from the camp and in the vicinage of a rough country. It was the opinion of Superintendent Meacham that the presence of the cavalry at either of these places would have the effect of intimidating the hostiles and at the same time afford assurance to the settlers which would not be the case were the cavalry stationed at Yainix. The suggestion of the superintendent was put into effect; the troops came direct to the threatened country.

In accordance with instructions from headquarters of the Department of the Columbia, Major Elmer Otis, commanding at Camp Warner, left that point March 15, 1872, to move on the threatened country. With him was a detachment of two officers, Captain D. Perry and Second Lieutenant J. G. Kyle; Acting Assistant Surgeon L. L. Dorr; Chief Packer Mason McCoy, Guide and Interpreter Donald McKay; twenty-seven enlisted men and a pack train of 25 mules. He proceeded first to Fort Klamath, arriving there March 24th. On the 30th Major Otis sent Guide and Interpreter Donald McKay, with four Indians, to invite the Indians to a conference ten miles from Link river, east, on Lost river, at a place called the "Gap." This conference was to be held without the presence of troops.

April 1st the command started for Link river. The force was augmented by a detachment from Fort Klamath as follows: Lieutenant Moss, Acting Assistant Surgeon C. W. Knight, 23 enlisted men and ten pack mules. The command reached Link river on the following day. It was met here by McKay and also by two messengers from Captain Jack. Following a considerable "pow wow" with the messengers it was learned that Captain Jack would meet Major Otis at the Gap on the following day, April 3d, provided he would bring no troops. Major Otis took with him Major J. N. High; sub-Indian agent of the Klamath agency, and I. D. Applegate, commissary at Yainix agency; Interpreter Donald McKay and the four Indian scouts and proceeded to the Gap. About noon Captain Jack, with some 35 or 40 Indians made their appearance, all armed. However, Jack left some of his arms on the opposite side of the river. The council began between Major Otis, Captain Jack and about 35 of his warriors. Some of the neighbors, settlers in the vicinity, also made their appearance. Following is a report of the conference written by Edward Everett Young, the substance of which was gained from an interview with Major J. N. High, who was at that time Indian agent:

Jack and his warriors, who were divided into three bands, occupied what is known as the Tule lake district, 15 to 40 miles south and east of the Klamath Falls. Colonel E. Otis, a field officer of the United States army, and Major J. N. High, the then Indian agent, met Ivan Applegate at the town of Linkville, and after consultation decided to communicate with Captain Jack through a squaw known as "Mary," and arrange for a friendly meeting next day.

The woman left Klamath Falls soon after dark on this May night. She rode a horse and promised to return with her message from Jack at dawn the next morning. This she did, reporting that Jack would see the commission that day without arms and with only an equal number of men. It was understood that Captain Oliver C. Applegate, who was then in charge of the sub-agency at Yainax, on the reservation, should join them the next day and act as secretary of the commission, which he did. With him came Dave Hill, the Indian, always friendly to the whites, and one other Indian. These then made up the party representing the white men and the government, which went out on that occasion to meet one of the fiercest Indian warriors of whom border history makes any note. Colonel E. Otis, United States Army, Major J. N. High, Government Indian agent at the time; Captain O. C. Applegate, in charge of the sub-agency at Yainax; Ivan Applegate, pioneer, interpreter and general defender of the settlers; Dave Hill, the friendly Klamath Indian from the reservation.

The party arrived at the rendezvous on time, but no Indians were visible. The meeting place was in an abandoned dwelling situated in Lost river gap, about ten miles from here to the southeast. Finally the Indians were seen coming horseback and following the Lost river road, which afforded the whites only a partial view by glimpses, and the number of Indians could not be determined. Major High maintains that there were 70 in the band, while Captain Applegate is of the opinion that there were not more than 50. They rode to a clump of small trees in a flat bend of Lost river, and there detailed men from their band to hold their horses. Later developments showed them to have been armed with Winchesters and revolvers. They left their rifles behind with their horses, but wore their pistols as also did the whites, despite the former precaution.

So soon as Captain Jack and his warriors approached the meeting house it was observed by the Applegates, who understood these tribes thoroughly, that they were hostile, and but rudely concealed their predetermined plan to murder the entire commission. They did not greet the commission when they arrived but elbowed their way into the cabin where the council was to be held. Captain Oliver Applegate went instantly in among them to determine whether they bore side arms. This he soon ascertained by rubbing up against them and feeling the butts of their pistols through their clothing. He quietly gave his associates to understand that Jack and his warriors were to murder all the whites and the friendly Indians. There seemed to be no other recourse but to proceed with the business of the peace commission, await results and take chances, which at best looked like certain death. At this point Major High will be introduced and allowed to tell his story in his own modest way:

"There was only one door to the little abandoned dwelling in which we met. It was formerly occupied by a pioneer named Galbraith. There was a little table on the left of the door as one entered. On the side toward the door sat Colonel Otis and on the other side sat Captain O. C. Applegate. He was acting as secretary for the commission, reducing all questions and answers to writing to be submitted to Washington. Ivan Applegate was the interpreter, and while Captain Jack could speak fairly good English, he preferred to speak through an interpreter on this and other similar occasions. I was sitting on the right of Colonel Otis and nearest the door. The cabin was packed with Indians. They were in an ugly humor and their questions and answers and general demeanor did not please Colonel Otis. Finally, appearing somewhat exasperated and evidently discouraged at the prospect of not arriving at any satisfactory understanding, he gave vent to a remark expressing his feelings, and at the same time wrenched his belt around, bringing his revolver to the front and within easy reach. All the commissioners followed suit. Scar Face Charley, Jack's chief lieutenant, was standing near me and a little in front. He looked down at me, and, observing my revolver's hilt, asked with a sneer what I thought I was going to do with that. I answered that they had come to kill us, but that some of them would die as well. I told him that I would get him the first one.

Captain Jack had been sitting across the room against the wall and his keen eye and ear had seen and heard what had passed between Scar Face Charley and myself. He came swiftly to us and asked us what we were quarreling about, but before I could reply beckoned me to follow him outside. I felt sure that I could see my finish. I went. As we passed out of the door Jack said something to Charley in their native tongue, but under his breath. I want to divert here to say that while in the cabin and expecting that every minute would be our last, I could not but observe the calmness and serenity of Captain Applegate, whose hand never even trembled in his writing, although he knew that any scratch of the pen might have been his last.

"Jack and I walked about ten paces from the cabin, when he suggested that we lie down under some small underbrush. We talked there I think about an hour. I was not in the best of humor, and upbraided him, charging that he had evidently come to a peace conference with his warriors instructed to murder us. He looked at me silently for a few minutes and then answered that he had come there to kill us all. He spoke fairly good English. I began to reason with him. I asked him what he wanted; what he was holding out for. He answered that he wanted for his people the Tule lake district, and explained that without its grasses and fish products neither their ponies nor themselves could subsist. He explained that the section in question had belonged to their fathers before them; that the only way to insure peace between them and the Klamaths was to build a stone wall from the earth to the sky, not meaning a material one, but a legal one; one which it would be death for either one to cross. He grew excited and jabbed a stick in the ground with his right hand, remarking as he did it, that he would hold that country, meaning the Tule lake district and the lava beds or die in the attempt.

"I tried to show him that he was taking the wrong course by deciding to murder us. I explained that I was the agent of the government, and willing to treat him and his people fairly; that I was not his personal enemy; that bloodshed would delay him in getting what he wanted. I told him that the Applegates had always been the Indians' friends when the latter were in the right, and that they were the interpreter and secretary of our commission, and that at present we could not present the Modocs' claim, etc., at Washington without the assistance of the Applegates. He seemed to follow me closely, and hope began to revive for myself and companions. I told him that Colonel Otis had never done him a wrong, but was a field officer of the United States Army, and if Jack's band killed Otis the army would send enough soldiers out to surely kill Jack and his people. I promised that if he would give us time the matter would be submitted to Washington and he would be heard.

"Finally he fixed his piercing eye on me and looked at me with an expression of disappointment and anger which I shall never forget, and then slowly said:

"I came here to-day to kill you all, but you have changed my mind for the present. You and your friends may go this time, but I'll be ——— if I don't kill the next peace commissioners who come near me. I'm tired of this talk, talk, all time talk.'

"I thanked him and suggested at once that he go into the cabin and so inform his warriors, to which he replied:

"When we left the cabin I said to Scar Face, you not kill until I come back; so your people are safe.'

"I then understood what he had muttered to his lieutenant as we passed out of the door. Our commission returned all safe, but Jack kept his oath and General Canby and Rev. Mr. Thomas of the next commission were murdered and A. B. Meacham would have been had not a friendly squaw now on the reservation and known as Toby Riddle, ran in and cried out that the soldiers were coming. As it was Meacham was scalped, but the scalp was left dangling in the rush for safety.

"I asked Jack on that occasion if I could take my wife and mother, who were sick, from Klamath Falls to Red Bluffs, California, where I would reach the railroad. His warriors infested the mountains intervening, and plains, and life was not safe. He told me that he would guarantee that I could make the trip unmo-lested. I agreed to get ready and start on a certain day, which I did. Sikes Warden drove the ambulance, and George Barge drove the wagon for us. We traveled the first day and camped the first night and saw no Indians. The second night about one o'clock, I was sitting at my right front wagon wheel smoking. My wife and mother were sound asleep. I looked to my right, and there, not three feet from my side stood an Indian warrior, tall, straight and silent as a post. My hair seemed to push my cap off my head. I swallowed my heart back a time or two, and then exclaimed:

"What do you want here?" to which came the answer in English: 'Nothing.'

"I then asked, 'where are you going?' He answered, 'Nowhere.'

"I then ventured, 'Did you come here to fight?' At this he broke into a real, hearty laugh, a wild laugh which rang out on the night air almost like an echo from hell. Between his fits of laughter he finally ejaculated: 'If I had come to fight you would not now be here to talk.'

"This reassured me completely. I realized instantly that what he said was absolutely true. He then motioned me to a log a few feet away, and after assuring me again of his friendly mission, said: 'Captain Jack tell me watch you three days and two nights. Any Indian make ready to kill you I say to them Captain Jack say no. I near you all day yesterday, all night last night; all day today and night. Tomorrow I be near you all day. Tomorrow night I leave you. You then be near Red Bluff.'

"So saying he vanished into the darkness and I never saw him more. Again alone in the forest, surrounded by blood-thirsty savages known to be on the warpath, I sat and thought over the strange, contradictory elements of character possessed by the unfortunate Jack. He had merely given me his word that I should not suffer while passing through his alleged territory or that occupied by his men, and yet he had sent one of his men to shadow me all the way and protect me from his own men. Yet about seven months later Jack and his men killed General Canby and Rev. Mr. Thomas of the next peace commission. Jack paid for his perfidy on the gallows at Fort Klamath, October 3, 1873."

With all due respect for Major High, and with our knowledge of his services at the conference, and his intention of giving an accurate account of the event, there are a few corrections which the author deems necessary to make. This is in order that the report of the peace commission may stand as unimpeachable history. Our authority for these corrections is from a source that cannot be disregarded.

Major High has placed the number of Indians present at 70; there were, probably, not to exceed one-half of that number. We, also, believe that Major High has considerably overestimated the danger to the party who composed the commission. While subsequent events fairly proved that Captain Jack and his associates were cold-blooded cut-throats, capable of the basest treachery; while those present realized fully the character of the savages with whom they were dealing; while there was more or less danger, as there invariably was when in contact with this, the worst element of the Modoc tribe, the fears that were entertained by Major High were not manifested by the other members of the party. We believe that there was no more than the ordinary danger attached to the meeting.

The fact that Captain Jack provided a guard for the family of Major High in their trip out of the country is, certainly, worthy of consideration, and was so regarded by himself. It was an exception to Jack's general conduct. We have talked with a number of veterans of the Modoc War. Some of them had had personal acquaintance with Captain Jack and members of his company. Their testimony is almost unanimous that Jack was a savage of savages; a red man who was not noble; a man with no decency of character and without honor; one who possessed none of the traits with which he was accredited by a few people, most of whom, however, lived east of the Appalachian range of mountains.

We present here the official report of the conference as made by Major Otis to the Assistant Adjutant General of the Department of the Columbia:

On the 3d of April, 1872, Major Elmer Otis, First Cavalry, held a talk with Captain Jack, chief of the Modoc Indians, at "the Gap" on Lost river, Oregon. Mr. High, sub-agent of the Klamath agency, and Mr. Applegate, commissary at Yainax station, and about 35 men of the Modoc tribe being present.

Major Otis informed Captain Jack that settlers complain that his band frighten women and children at their homes during the absence of the men, by going about armed and demanding food; that the Modocs have stolen cattle, and hay for their ponies and turned their animals in to graze, or have tramped down the grass in hay fields while in the pursuit of game; that these acts charged as committed during the past winter, and still continued.

Captain Jack was warned that he must restrain or punish his men, or the whites would do it. He was reminded that the country in which he lived did not belong to his tribe, having been ceded by the Klamath tribe, which the Modocs signed; that his band were only suffered to remain where they are until the president can determine the propriety of giving them a suitable portion of land to live on apart from the Klamaths, and he was warned that he must control his men thoroughly and prevent their further molesting the settlers and that troops would, for the present, be kept in the neighborhood to secure their quiet and good order.

Major Otis demanded of Captain Jack that he keep his Indians apart from the settlers, except when they desired to work; that when in need of food they should go to Camp Warner for supplies, but under no circumstances go armed among the settlers to demand food or steal it.

Captain Jack at first denied these charges, and throughout the talk evaded, as far as possible, direct answers to specific charges against his band. He endeavored to convey the impression that if these thefts had been committed at all, they were the acts of the Klamaths (to which tribe the Modocs are hostile) or of other Indians, and that his own disposition, and that of his tribe, was friendly.

When Major Otis arrived in Linkville with his troops early in April, 1872, at the time of the conference with Captain Jack, he interviewed many of the settlers there and in the vicinity in regard to the conditions. The evidence was almost unanimous. They asserted that in 1870 and 1871 they, the settlers, were either located or seeking suitable sites for ranches in the Lost river country, or in the neighborhood of Tule lake; that after leaving the Klamath reservation in 1870, the Modocs claimed the entire country in that vicinity, and demanded compensation for ranching, or for hay cut; that they stole, committed depredations, assumed a hostile attitude and excited such fears for the safety of their property, and in a few cases for life, so as to drive them (the settlers) from the country. Such was the evidence adduced from the testimony of Messrs. Poe, Bull, G. S. Miller, Charles Monroe, George Nurse, Drury Davis, Joseph Seeds, Hudson, Applegate, Forcythe and Trip, residents of the Klamath country.

On the other hand two settlers, Henry Miller, later killed by the Indians, and Mr. Ball, who resided respectively ten and six miles from the Modoc camp, stated that they had not been molested, and did not believe that the Modocs had committed any of the crimes of which they were accused. Both were friendly to Captain Jack and accompanied that chief to the conference with Major Otis.

The intentions of the military authorities at the time troops were sent to the Modoc country are shown by the following extract from a letter by General Canby dated April 17, 1872:

I propose to hold the Modocs under quiet supervision for the present, by keeping a detachment of cavalry at this point, selected by Major Otis for the purpose of exercising a salutary restraint upon the Indians and preventing any collision between them and the settlers. The temper of both parties is such that a very slight cause may give rise to serious consequence.

Nothing having been accomplished by Major Otis' attempts to bring about a peaceable removal of the Modocs in April, conditions remained about the same as formerly during the summer of 1872. The Washington authorities were wrestling with the question of what to do with the Modoc Indians. At last the proposed plan of giving them a new reservation was discarded and in the latter part of November, 1872, F. B. Odeneal, superintendent of Indian affairs for Oregon, having replaced Mr. Meacham, received instructions from the Commissioner of Indian affairs at Washington to remove the Modocs to Camp Yainax of the Klamath reservation, "peaceably if you possibly can, but forcibly if you must." The superintendent went at once to Link river to arrange for a conference with the Indian chiefs. The band which were defying the authorities numbered about eighty warriors all well armed. Mr. Odeneal sent I. D. Applegate to the camp of the Modocs to arrange for a conference to be held at Link river. Mr. Applegate returned bearing a haughty answer from the Modocs. They defiantly declined to meet the superintendent. They authorized Mr. Applegate to say that they did not desire to see or talk with Mr. Odeneal, and that they would not go upon the Klamath reservation.

In a communication to Major John Green, commanding the forces at Fort Klamath, dated November 27, the superintendent in accordance with his instructions from the commissioner of Indian affairs, called upon the military authorities to force the Modocs to go to Camp Yainax on the Klamath reservation. The matter of compelling the Modocs to go to the reservation was on this date transferred from the department of Indian affairs to the military. The hostile Indians at this time were encamped near the mouth of Lost river. Just previous to the commencement of hostilities they were in three bands, as follows:

Captain Jack, with several warriors and their families, about three miles from the mouth of Lost river, on the west side.

Hooka Jim, a petty chief, with his band, occupied the shore of Tule lake, east of the mouth of Lost river, in Oregon.

The Hot Creek band were camped on the south side of Little Klamath lake, in California, some twenty-five miles from Captain Jack's band in a southwesterly direction.

November 28th order 93 was issued from Fort Klamath signed by F. A. Boutelle, adjutant, by order of Major Green. This was for Captain James Jackson, First U. S. Cavalry, with all the available men of his troop to proceed at once via Link river, to Captain Jack's camp, endeavoring to reach there before the following morning. If any opposition was offered on the part of the Modocs to the requirements of the superintendent of Indian affairs, Captain Jackson was ordered, if possible, to arrest Captain Jack, Black Jim and Scar Face Charley. His orders were to accomplish the desires of the superintendent without bloodshed, if possible, but if the Indians refused to obey the orders of the government he was ordered to use such force as should be necessary to compel them to do so; "and the responsibility must rest on the Indians who defy the authority of the government."

Captain Jackson left Fort Klamath at nine o'clock on the morning of the 28th and at once proceeded to the camp of the Modocs. Then ensued the first battle of the Modoc War. Following is a graphic report of the same, and the events leading up to it as related by Ivan Applegate:

At noon on the 28th day of November, 1872, Captain Jackson with 35 men of Company B, First United States Cavalry, left Fort Klamath and arrived at the pioneer town of Linkville at a little after dark. Here he met Superintendent Odeneal and received instructions as follows:

"When you arrive at the camp of the Modocs, request an interview with their head men and say to them that you did not come to fight or to harm them, but to have them go peaceably to Camp Yainax on Klamath reservation, where ample provisions have been made for their comfort and subsistence, and where, by treaty, they agreed to live. Talk kindly but firmly to them, and whatever else you may do, I desire to urge that if there is any fighting let the Indians be the aggressors. Fire no guns except in self-defense, after they have first fired upon you. I. D. Applegate will accompany you as my representative; he will also act as guide and interpreter."

During that dark, rainy night we made our way from Linkville down the Klamath valley towards the stone bridge on Lost river, where Captain Jack was encamped on the west side of the river. About a third of his forces under Hooka Jim and the Curley-Headed doctor and some other of his trusty lieutenants were encamped on the east side of the river near the Dennis Crowley cabin.

We found it very difficult in the darkness to make our way through the heavy sage brush, for we had to leave the road in order to avoid being discovered by the wily Indians who doubtless were observing us closely as possible every movement. We followed along the foot of the chain of hills west from Lost river and at daybreak we were about one mile west of the Modoc camp, which was at that point on the river bank where Dan Colwell's residence now stands.

The company was formed into two platoons and we rode directly through the village and halted upon the river bank, facing the encampment. As we came near the river Scar Face Charley, who had crossed just before we came up, fired at us from the other side of the river, shouting at the same time to arouse the sleeping Indians. In a moment there was great excitement and commotion. As soon as the men were dismounted and advanced in line, standing at order arms in front of the horses, I was directed to enter the camp to see Captain Jack and inform him of our friendly mission and assure him that no harm was intended but that he would be required to remove with his people to the reservation. Going from camp to camp I was not able to find Captain Jack. As I came out of one of the huts I saw Scar Face coming up the river bank. As he passed Major Jackson, who was still mounted, the major ordered him to halt, at the same time drawing his revolver. To this Scar Face paid no attention, but came on into the village, all the time haranguing his people and demanding that they fight to the death; telling them that if they would be quick enough they could kill every soldier without the loss of a man. With an oath he rushed past me and went into Bogus Charley's tent, and in a moment both Scar Face and Bogus appeared with their guns drawn and called to the women and children to throw themselves flat on the ground. Then I knew that they were going to fire upon us. I immediately started toward our men, saying, "Major, they are going to fire." At this the major ordered Lieutenant Boutelle, who stood in advance of the line, to take four men and arrest the two Indians who had guns in their hands. As Boutelle stepped forward with the four men the two Indians fired. The warriors in the camps and in the heavy sage brush in the rear of the village, fired almost simultaneously. Then all was din and commotion; men were falling in the line; the riderless horses were dashing here and there and kicking among us, but instantly came the order from the brave major, "fire!" The attack was so sudden and desperate, the Modocs rushing on to us with demoniac yells, that the men were forced back a step or two, and it seemed for a moment that the thinned line would yield and break. But immediately came the order, "forward!" and it was like an inspiration. The men sprang forward under the leadership of the brave Boutelle, delivering a deadly fire, and the Indians were forced back. Scar Face's first shot struck Boutelle's revolver, disabling it, and cutting through the sleeve of his blouse, passed through the clothing on his right shoulder. Scar Face was knocked down by a bullet which cut through the handkerchief he had tied around his head, and Watchman, Captain Jack's most daring lieutenant, fell, riddled with bullets almost at our feet. Boutelle's calmness saved us. Speaking to his men coolly and confidently, he led the charge into and through the village, driving the Indians out, advancing his skirmish line far beyond the heavy sage brush.

O. C. Applegate, who was to take charge of Captain Jack's band in case they came onto the reservation, rode from his station at Yainax on November 28th, reaching Linkville (Klamath Falls) late in the evening. Superintendent Odeneal informed him of the movement on foot and requesting him to be present to assist in securing, if possible, a peaceable removal of the Modocs. With the Klamath scout, Dave Hill, and five trusty citizens, he forded Lost river near the Lone Pine that night and reached the Crowley cabin, near Hooka Jim's camp, about daylight on the morning of the 29th, finding there Messenger Brown of the Indian Department, Dennis Crowley, Dan Colwell and a few other citizens. When daylight revealed the presence of the cavalry in Captain Jack's camp, Hooka's men made a rush for their canoes, evidently to reinforce Captain Jack, but were prevented by the citizens. The object of the authorities was explained to the Indians and a few of them were in the act of giving up their arms when the firing began at Captain Jack's camp. Instantly the Modocs fired on the citizens and a fierce fight at close range took place, so that looking across the river during the fight with Captain Jack, we could see another battle going on almost opposite to us. Two citizens, Jack Thurber and William Nus were killed and Joe Penning was maimed for life, and the Indians securing their horses, which were near at hand, escaped to the long, rocky ridge east of where the Frank Adams farm is now located; while the citizens rallied at the Crowley cabin.

Captain Jack, with most of his best and most desperate men, had made good his escape, although at at the time both he and Scar Face were reported killed, even by the prisoners. We had lost Sergeant Harris, killed, and as nearly as I can remember, six men were mortally wounded, and several others painfully though not dangerously hurt. Among the Indians killed were Watchman and We-sing-ko-pos, leading warriors, and Black Jim, Long Jim and Miller's Charley were among the wounded. The loss on our side amounted to nearly a third of the military force then in the field and was quite sufficient to disable Captain Jackson's small force for the time being.

After the fight Captain Jackson sent his wounded across the river in a canoe, Dave Hill being the oarsman; Surgeon McElderry and a few more as a guard were also taken over and the men were conveyed to the Crowley cabin. The remaining troopers mounted their jaded horses and, as there was no ford in the vicinity, hastily rode up toward the Stukel ford, seven miles distant. Before arriving at the ford word reached them that Jack and his infuriated men had renewed the fight. Looking toward Tule lake great volumes of smoke could be seen arising from burning buildings. Dashing through the rapid, the poor horses seemed to realize the awful situation as they put renewed effort down the river with utmost speed on the east side and soon the cavalry rode on to the ground where the citizens and Hooka's men had so lately fought, but the wily savage was wreaking vengeance on the inoffensive settlers beyond the ridge, on the plains at the head of Tule lake.

The butchering and devastation on Tule lake had already begun, and eighteen settlers were added that day to the long list of Modoc victims. The Modoc War was fairly inaugurated. A war, short, terrible and dramatic, but the unwritten history of which would fill volumes. From the beginning until the 3d of October, 1873, when the curtain fell upon the last scene of the tragic drama, the execution of Captain Jack, Black Jim, Schonchin John and Boston Charley for the peace commission massacre, it abounded in thrilling incidents and startling adventures.

It is here proper to add to the above two official reports made by Captain Jackson concerning this opening battle of the Modoc War, November 29, 1872. Although each report covers certain features of the same event, the two should be read together in order to properly understand the circumstances from Captain Jackson's view point:

Crowley's Ranch, Lost River, Oregon, November 30, 1872: Major—I have the honor to report that I jumped the camp of Captain Jack's Modoc Indians yesterday morning, soon after daylight, completely surprising them.

I demanded their surrender and disarming, and asked for a parley with Captain Jack. Captain Jack, Scar Face Charley, Black Jim and some others would neither lay down their arms nor surrender, and some of them commenced making hostile demonstrations against us, and finally opened fire. I immediately poured volley after volley among the hostile Indians, took their camp, killed eight or nine warriors and drove the rest into the hills. During the engagement I had one man killed and seven wounded, three of the last severely and, perhaps, dangerously.

The band that I attacked was on the south side of the river; another smaller band on the north side was attacked by a party of ten or twelve citizens, and their surrender demanded; but when the firing commenced in Captain Jack's camp, these Indians opened on the citizens, and drove them to the refuge of Crowley's ranch. One citizen was killed during this fight, and two others coming up the road, unsuspecting of any trouble, were shot; one (Mr. Nus) mortally wounded, and the other Joe Penning, badly. My force was too weak to pursue and capture the Indians that made off, owing to the necessity of taking immediate care of my wounded, and protecting the few citizens who had collected at Crowley's ranch. The Indians were all around us, and apprehensive of a rear attack, I destroyed Captain Jack's camp, and crossed to the other side of the river by the ford, a march of fifteen miles, taking post at Crowley's ranch, where I now am. I need re-enforcements and orders as to future course. There are a number of citizens and families in this valley and it will be necessary to look after them and protect them if they are not already killed. Most of the Indians have retired to their caves south of Tule lake, but I imagine they will soon be out in war parties. From the best information I can secure, Captain Jack, Scar Face Charley and Black Jim are killed or mortally wounded.

The troop behaved gallantly and deserves every praise. The fight was at close quarters, and very severe for thirty minutes. The citizens engaged did good service, I learn, and deserve much credit; but for them we would have had a fire in the rear that would have been very destructive. The Indians, or their leaders, were determined on a fight at all hazards, and got enough of it, I think. The worst men among them are, undoubtedly, killed, not less than 16 of them being put out of the way. I need more men, for the valley will have to be scouted to protect its citizens. The troops from Warner should come over immediately if it is intended to pursue these Indians. Please send me instructions by courier at once. Dr. McElderry, who goes up this morning with the wounded will give you more detailed information.

Citizens killed: John Thurber, William Nus; wounded, Joe Penning.

Soldiers killed: Private Harris; soldiers wounded, Corporal Fitzgerald, severely; Corporal Chandler; Private Totten, Private Doyle; Private Kasshafer, severely; Private Kershaw; Private Gallagher, severely.

In haste, I am respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES JACKSON,
Captain First Cavalry,
Commanding B Troop.

Major John Green,
First Cavalry.

Later and fuller report of the battle by Captain Jackson; also an account of the massacre of settlers and the names of the victims:

Camp at Crowley's ranch, Lost River, Oregon,
December 2, 1872:

Major—I sent you two days ago a hasty report of operations in the field. I now have the honor to submit a detailed report of my operations since I left Fort Klamath, Oregon.

In compliance with your orders No. 99, of November 28th, I moved from Fort Klamath, Oregon, at 11 a. m., with Lieutenant Boutelle, Dr. McElderry, 36 men of B troop in column and four with the pack train. Guided by Mr. Ivan Applegate we marched all day and night through a heavy rainstorm, and arrived at the principal camp of the Modoc Indians about daylight. Forming line I moved down on the camp at a trot, completely surprising the Indians, and creating great commotion among them. Halting just at the edge of the camp, I called upon them to lay down their arms and surrender. I also got Mr. Applegate to interpret to them my intentions and ask them to comply with the orders of the Indian department. Some of them seemed willing to do so, but Scar Face Charley, Black Jim and some others kept their guns and commenced making hostile demonstrations against us. After repeated demands on them to lay down their arms and surrender had been unheeded, and seeing that the hostile Indians were getting more numerous and determined, I directed Lieutenant Boutelle to take some men from the line and arrest the leaders if possible. This order was followed by firing on the part of the Indians, and a general engagement immediately ensued. I poured in volley after volley among their worst men, killing most of them, capturing the camp and driving the Indians to the refuge of the brush and hills, from whence they kept up a desultory fire for some little time. I lost during the engagement, and almost at the first fire one man killed and seven wounded and one horse killed. After driving the Indians out of range it became necessary to take care of my wounded; to prevent the squaws remaining in camp from killing and mutilating them. Leaving a slight skirmish line in charge of Lieutenant Boutelle, I took what men could be spared and had the dead and wounded carried to the river bank, and from there canoed across to Crowley's ranch, half a mile below.

I then dismantled the camp, capturing Captain Jack's three rifles and his two saddles. All Indian guns found in camp were broken up or thrown in the river. At the same time that I moved on the main camp of the Modocs, a smaller camp on the north side of the river was attacked by the citizens, among them Mr. Oliver Applegate, Mr. Brown, Mr. Jack Burnett, Mr. Dennis Crowley, Mr. C. Monroe, Mr. Thurber, Mr. Colwell and others; they, also, demanded the surrender of these Indians, which was not acceded to, and when the firing commenced on the main camp they opened on the citizens and the citizens on them. One citizen (Mr. Thurber) was killed, and it is believed several Indians were killed and wounded. The citizens after the first attack, retired to Mr. Crowley's ranch and kept up the fight at long range, preventing the Indians from crossing the river and attacking my flank or rear.

Two citizens coming up the road, not knowing of the fight, were shot, one mortally and the other dangerously wounded. Soon after the fight Mr. Applegate, Mr. Brown, Mr. Burnett and some others left to warn citizens in other places of danger, leaving but a small force at the house where my wounded had been sent, and where a family resided. Mr. Crowley rode up and asked for protection at the ranch, stating that the Indians were preparing for a new attack. I mounted my command and moved out at a trot for the ford, some eight miles up the river, sending Lieutenant Boutelle with a skirmish line to clear the Indians out of the sage brush, which he did effectually. It was between 3 and 4 o'clock when the troop arrived at the ranch, where we took post to await supplies and care for the wounded. While moving around to the ranch some stragglers Indians collected on the other side of the river and burned a haystack and house belonging to Mr. Monroe. After this they moved out down Tule lake for their refuge in the caves and rocks south of the lake. One band from the north side of the river, who had been fighting the citizens, moved down on that side of the lake during the fight, and commenced killing the unwarned inhabitants of Tule Lake valley.

It was not until the next morning after the fight, while sending the wounded away in charge of the surgeon, that I learned that there were any inhabitants near the scene of the conflict, or that they had been unwarned of approaching danger. I immediately sent a detachment with Mr. Crowley to ascertain the condition or fate of these people. He visited the first place (Mr. Boddy's) about three and one-half miles below his (Mr. Crowley's) ranch, and found the house deserted, but everything in order; no sign of attack or murder; no tracks around the house, a dog tied to the doorstep and animals in the corral. Thinking from appearances that the family must have had warning and fled, and believing that the warning had been carried down the valley, he came back and so reported.

That evening, November 30, I moved to the ford to meet the supply train and prevent its being intercepted by prowling bands of Indians. The pack train came up at midnight, and the next morning, December 1st, the command was moved back to Crowley's ranch for station, until such time as supplies sufficient for a campaign could be collected. The evening of the 1st of December two citizens, residents of Tule lake valley, came in and reported that the men of the Boddy family had been murdered right after, or during the fight, by the band of Indians who had escaped, and that the women of the family had not been molested, but had walked across the mountains to Lost river bridge and were then in Linkville. Lieutenant Boutelle with a detachment was sent down with these men this morning, and some of the bodies of the Boddy family found in the timber, quite a distance from the house, where they had been cutting and hauling wood. The detachment was proceeding on down the valley when they were met by Mr. Ivan Applegate, Mr. Langell and some others, who had come up the valley visiting the ranches on the north side of the lake. They reported the killing of the men of the Brotherton family (three), two herders and Mr. Henry Miller. Mrs. Brotherton, with her two little boys had fought the Indians away from the house, wounding some of them. She, with her three children, two boys and a little girl, came up with the party of citizens and soldiers and are at this station. Quite a party of citizens have collected here.

Tomorrow quite a large force will move down the valley to hunt up the remains of the murdered inhabitants. I send you a list of those known or supposed to have been killed:

I have sent a detachment to Clear lake for the protection of Mr. Jesse Applegate's family, and will move the infantry you send me into Langell's valley and Clear lake, the only places now threatened. A company of Klamath Indians, 36 in number, commanded by Captain Ferre, of Klamath Indian Agency, came in today and will go out on the trail of the Modocs tomorrow to hunt them up and keep them from raiding until the troops can move on their place of hiding. I think it will be necessary to make a depot of supplies at this point, as beyond this, in the direction the Indians have gone, wagons can not be moved any distance and the troops will have to depend on a pack train for supplies.

The troops behaved splendidly under fire, although a number of the men were raw recruits. Dr. McElderry was present on the field during the fight, and

I take great pleasure in commending him and Lieutenant Boutelle for coolness, gallantry and efficient service.

I am, Major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES JACKSON,
Captain First Cavalry,
Commanding B Troop.

MAJ. JOHN GREEN,
First Cavalry Commanding,
Fort Klamath, Oregon.

The following are extracts from a letter written by Major John Green, commanding at Fort Klamath, dated December 3, 1872, reporting the first battle:

It was believed that the Modocs would submit to go on a reservation if surprised by the troops; if not, the leaders were to be arrested if possible, in the hope that the balance would surrender.

The troop as expected made its march, and completely surprised the Indians, and could have almost destroyed them had it not been fair to give them a chance to submit without using force. * * * I expect that the cavalry troop from Camp Warner will reach the field of operations by the 6th or 7th instant, after which, when I hear from district headquarters, I expect to go to the field in person. If the war be prolonged (and I fear it will be) it will be necessary to have a depot of supplies at or near Tule lake for the troops operating against the Indians. * * * At the urgent request of citizens of Linkville, I have issued 20 muskets and ten carbines, with ammunition, for self defense. I have also issued 10 carbines to the Yainax agency, and ten to the Klamath agency at the request of the agents. I understand from Dr. Dyar, agent for the Klamaths, that he has sent 30 or 40 Klamath Indians into the Modoc country.

As is almost invariably the case in movements of the military, there was considerable criticism of the officers who participated in and were responsible for the initial fight with the Modocs at Lost river, on November 29, 1872. It has been urged that the soldiers should not have undertaken the removal of the Indians with the small force which was at Captain Jackson's command. The authorities believed that by appearing at the camp of the Modocs unexpectedly the latter being taken by surprise, would at once yield and allow themselves to be taken peacefully to their reservation. That such was not the case, and that many lives were lost as a result is, certainly, to be deplored. The Indians outnumbered the troops sent to conduct them to the reservation, and were fully armed.

But this plan, it appears to us, is not open to grave censure. It surely had a precedent as we have previously shown when in 1870, Captain Jack's whole band, when taken by surprise, were removed to the reservation without a shot being fired. And that, too, with a force of only fourteen men, and they not in the best fighting condition. No doubt exists in the minds of any of those who took part in the battle that the troops were badly handled and that serious blunders were made. Instead of placing his men in a position to prevent the escape of the Indians, and then making known his errand, Captain Jackson marched his troop right into the heart of the village and lined them up on the river bank on foot, the horses having been left some distance on the other side of the camp. They were in an exposed, perilous position. The Indians knew it. The latter were in their tepees, out of sight and protected from the fire of the soldiers by the ridges of earth which were always banked up at the base of the wickiups. Although, as stated by Captain Jackson, the troop "fired volley after volley into the camp of the Indians," the only damage to them was the wounding of a squaw. This is a matter of fact, although otherwise reported. Had this camp been properly approached Captain Jackson should have been able to remove the Modocs without a fight.

Without offering any further criticism on the handling of the troops at the time of the first battle, it remains our opinion that had the precedent established two years previously been followed, after this camp had been taken and the women and children captured, the Modoc War could have been ended then and there. A mistake was certainly made after the battle. It is an error concerning which very little has been written, but one which in our opinion was responsible for the massacre of the settlers which followed. Captain Jackson in his reports speaks of having captured the Modoc camp and the squaws. But he makes no mention of having later released them and permitted them to rejoin the warriors. This release of the women and children was responsible for the horrible butchery which followed. Is it possible that any one acquainted with the characteristics of Indians believes that the savages would have entered upon their butchery while their women were in the hands of the troops? It is indisputable that none of the whites were killed until after the squaws were released. The holding as prisoners of war of women and children may not favorably appeal to those who are acquainted only with civilized warfare, but such a course would have saved many lives.

Captain Jackson and his troops fully believed that in this first fight all the leaders and the worst Indians had been killed including Captain Jack. That fact was, doubtless, the reason the commander did not take the precaution to hold the camp and women after the battle. Believing that he had broken the power of the outlaws, the possibility of the butchery that followed did not, apparently, enter the head of Captain Jackson. While we can, at this late day, see that a mistake was made, we can, also see that it was a natural mistake under the conditions as Captain Jackson then saw them.

General Edward R. S. Canby, commanding the department of the Columbia, who was afterward killed by the Modocs, in a report dated January 15, 1873, said:

A grave mistake was no doubt committed in attempting their removal before a sufficient force had been collected to secure that result beyond the probability of failure. * * * The questions as to the time and manner of applying force rested in the discretion of the military commander to whom it had been committed and, while I think that Major Green was in error upon this point, I do not think that he or the superintendent should be judged wholly by the result. If the measures had succeeded, the conception and the execution would, probably, have been as highly commended as they are now censured.

CONTINUATION OF MODOC WAR—1872-73

The massacre of the settlers which was alluded to at the close of the preceding chapter, was one of the most deplorable incidents of the Modoc War. Subsequent to the affray between the command of Captain Jackson and the band of hostiles on the west side of Lost river, under Captain Jack, the Indians led by Hooka Jim, on the shore of Tule lake, east of the mouth of Lost river, scattered in small parties among the isolated settlements, within a radius of twenty-five miles, and massacred eighteen unoffending citizens, sacked and destroyed their residences and drove off their cattle and horses. For two days lasted this hellish work of butchery and pillage. Eleven citizens were murdered on the 29th, and seven on the 30th of November, by Hooka Jim's savages. This band had not been approached by the soldiery.

On the fateful 29th a few miles below the scene of the fight, a mule team was seen coming toward the Boddy residence, but no driver held the reins. The team was secured, unhitched and stabled by Mrs. Boddy. With apprehensive fear she called to her married daughter, Mrs. Schira, and hastily the two women started toward the woods where the men had gone that morning to their accustomed work. They had not gone far when they saw the Indians a short distance away and heard the fearsome war-whoop. Soon they came upon the stripped and mutilated body of Mr. Schira, and soon after those of Mr. Boddy and his elder son. The younger boy who had been on the plain below herding sheep could not be seen and the sheep were wandering at will among the sage. These heroic, but horror-stricken, women knew that all were killed; that nothing remained for them but to seek their own safety in flight; to hide themselves among the juniper and mahogany, in the almost trackless and, to them, unknown woods. Struggling onward, they knew not whither, only that they felt that they were going away from a sad and awful scene, soon night settled upon them among the mountain solitudes. As they shivered amid the snow and strove to look down through fears of burning anguish toward the mutilated forms of dear ones and upon desolated homes, what tongue could tell, what pen depict the poignancy of their grief. The following letter bearing upon this massacre, was written by General John E. Ross, of the Oregon militia to Adjutant Owens, dated Camp Tule lake, Oregon, December 12, 1872:

There were a number of families living down the east side of the lake, among them, the first below where the fight took place being the Boddy family. About three miles from the battlefield Mrs. Boddy and her married daughter, Mrs. Schira, were at the two respective houses of herself and daughter, only about fifty yards apart. They say that at 10 minutes to 12 o'clock m., on that day, not knowing anything of the fight in the morning just above them, the daughter looked out and saw her husband's team running down the hill from where himself and Mr. Boddy, her father and brother had gone after wood. Her mother and herself ran out to meet the team supposing it had run away and perhaps killed her husband. When they reached the team they saw blood scattered on the wagon and followed back on the track about half a mile, and found where her husband, Schira, had been dragged from the road about twenty yards, where she found him with his face buried in the sand, with gunshot wound in his cheek and through the back. They saw about this time six Indians and one squaw; four of them they knew, Hooka Jim, Long Jim, One-Eyed-Mose, Jerry and Hooka Jim's squaw. They rode up to us (them?) and asked for the other white man, and then rode past them. They (the women) then went on and found the son. He was shot through the chin, with several other wounds on his person. They then went on to ascertain if they could find anything of the father, and saw one more Indian at some distance, but did not recognize him. The indications were that there were more in the sage brush and juniper, as they saw two more at a great distance off. They were afraid to return to their home, and made across the hills for Lost river "Gap," and lay out on the hills that night after a wretched trip over the rocks and sage brush. They had no fire and came very near freezing to death. The next day the Indians, or a part of them, went about three miles below the Boddy ranch and killed one Alexander, who was herding sheep, and William Brotherton and two of his sons who were in the hills after wood, and came on to Mr. Brotherton's house, where his wife, her two small sons and daughter were. Mrs. Brotherton, with Spartan bravery, barred the doors and made loop holes, and with a good gun they had in the house kept the Indians at bay from Saturday noon until the following Monday before they got any relief. This point is six miles down the valley of the lake below the battle ground, at or near what is known as "Bloody Point." A part of my command, Company A, under Captain Kelly, has been very vigilant and industrious hunting for the dead bodies and the Indians. In fact they have been in the saddle all the time since they left Jacksonville. Yesterday a squad of men under command of Sergeant Snyder, found the body of one of the Boddy family, a young man who had been herding sheep. This boy had his throat cut from ear to ear, besides being shot. The body was found about two and one-half miles from the Indian ranch where the fight was. A portion of the command under Captain Kelly today found the body of Alexander about four miles below here, shot in a number of places through the body and hands. They also found today the body of Henry Miller, shot through the head and body; in fact badly shot to pieces, about five miles below here near Bloody Point. Those last named men were all killed on Saturday after the fight, probably twenty-four hours or more, having no knowledge, of course, of the fight, but being very close to it. I have ordered the bodies to be sent to Linkville for burial.

H. H. Blecher, who was one of the early settlers of the Klamath country, in after years related this incident of the war to the Klamath County Star of March 24, 1893:

"When the Indians were fighting at Tule Lake," he said, "I met them. Each warrior had nothing on but a suit of war paint, with a bandana kerchief round his head and one around his leg. They told me to go home, but I went down to California, and while I was gone my friends had me set down for dead. When I returned I discovered that I was alive. My 12,000 sheep and 800 head of cattle were, also, alive. I am going to live 100 years longer. Whiskey can't kill me; Indians won't kill me, and my enemies are all dead. Yes, sir, I am going to live another 100 years and then get on to a rosy summer cloud and sail to glory."

At this point we desire to deflect the thread of our story long enough to say a word or two concerning the part taken in the Modoc War and the protection afforded settlers by two men still residing in Klamath county, Oliver C. and Ivan Applegate.

To Captain O. C. Applegate is probably due more credit for saving the imperiled settlements of the Klamath country than any other man. The darkest period ever known in the history of Southern Oregon was during the Modoc War. His phenomenal control of the Paiutes, Snakes and Modocs under his charge at Yainax sub-agency at the beginning of the outbreak doubtless prevented many restless warriors from joining the hostiles. His courage and skill as captain of the company of citizens and picked Indian scouts organized by him for the protection of the settlements and for offensive operations in the lava beds, are well known and duly appreciated in the Klamath country.

Ivan Applegate has been referred to as "The pioneer defender of western homes; the noted scout of three Indian wars and respected citizen of Klamath county." During the Modoc War he many times took his life in his hands in order to protect the settlers. With a small body of men he scoured a country overrun with members of Captain Jack's band, far from the protecting aegis of soldiery, warning those who had not yet been attacked and assisting them to places of safety. Immediately after the outbreak he organized a force of volunteers in Linkville for this work. The small company consisted of himself, O. A. Stearns, John Burnette, Joseph Seeds, George Fiock, Charles Monroe and Jack Wright. While the troops were anxiously awaiting reinforcements, this party proceeded down Langell's valley to Clear lake and through the Tule lake country. They rescued Mrs. Brotherton, and children and gave warning to many others. Ivan Applegate served as guide and interpreter for nearly all the early commissions which attempted to remove Captain Jack's party to the Klamath reservation. He fought in the first battle of the Lava Beds, January 17, 1873, although attached to no command, and in General Miller's report, he received special mention for bravery on the field. In fact he took a part in the Modoc War second to no man whose name falls into the warp and woof of this history.

Following the outbreak and massacre in the valley settlers flocked to Linkville for protection. Accommodations of this little town were taxed to their utmost. Precautions were immediately taken to defend the town from an attack by the hostiles. On the high ground north of Main street, east and north of the present location of Baldwin's hardware store, was erected a stone enclosure wherein the people proposed to congregate and repel the Indians in case of attack. This wall was about five feet high. Farther south the Indians had all they could attend to and did not get so far north as Linkville; the town escaped attack. At Mr. Whitney's place, the Hot Springs property just east of the town, a stockade was erected, pierced with loop-holes, and surrounded by a trench wherein protection was offered those who desired to avail themselves of it. Throughout the entire country people were in a state of panic. At Merganser armed men picketed the town and guarded it from surprise. At a number of farm houses settlers gathered and placed pickets around them. War was in the air; the reign of terror existed for some time following the massacre.

At this dark period all classes of people labored under the greatest excitement. An incident is related illustrating to what length this excitement led some of them. December 4th a band of about forty-five Modocs who had been living on Hot creek and who had participated in none of the murders, were rounded up and headed for the reservation in charge of Messrs. Fairchild, Davis, Ball and Colver. They proceeded northward. On the 5th they reached Bob Whittle's ranch on Link river. Here they were met by a party of eight or ten settlers who opposed their proceeding further. They were also met by the Indian agent who informed the men in charge of the Hot creek band that a mob had congregated on the opposite side of the river which would certainly attack the Indians should they attempt to make a crossing. The settlers appeared imbued with but one idea and that was to wreak vengeance for the murders already committed and were not at all particular what Indians became the victims. These Modocs had been in no way connected with Captain Jack's band of desperadoes and had always been peacefully inclined. Those in charge of them attempted to pilot the Indians to the reservation without going through Linkville. But the Indians had become frightened; they bolted and scattered all over the country. Finally they found their way back to Yreka and were later taken to the reservation.

Following the first fight with the Indians reinforcements were at once sent to the front from Camps Warner, Bidwell, Harney and Fort Klamath. Every available soldier stationed at points in the district of the lakes was soon on the field as well as two companies of volunteers. Immediately after the outbreak and slaughter of settlers Governor Grover authorized the mobilization of a volunteer force to assist in bringing the hostile Modocs to time. This action was taken on receipt of a telegram from Hon. A. J. Burnette, dated Linkville, November 30th, which told of the massacre and stated that the forces in the field were insufficient to protect the settlements. A mass meeting was held at Ashland attended by over 100 citizens at which a resolution was adopted asking the governor to authorize them to recruit a force of volunteers to co-operate with the regular troops.

These Oregon volunteers were composed of Companies A, Captain Harrison Kelly, and B, Captain Oliver C. Applegate, under command of Brigadier General J. E. Ross. These two companies served during the first part of the war. Their term of service began December 2, 1872, and they were mustered out January 24, 1873. Companies C, Captain John H. Hyzer; D, Captain Thomas Mulholland; E, Captain George R. Rodgers, also under command of General Ross, were mustered in April 14, 1873, and served during the latter part of the war.

The part taken by the volunteers, many of whom are now residents of the county in which they fought, was important. They not only participated in the battles side by side with the regular troops, but they thoroughly policed the country of the lakes, protecting settlers and exerting a strong influence over other tribes who at times seemed on the point of joining the hostiles. Nor must we forget the point taken by the loyal Indian allies. Ivan Applegate has paid the following tribute to these allies of the whites in an oration delivered July 4, 1892:

"Only a few years ago the straggling settlements of Klamath would have been swept away by the hand of savage war had it not been for the noble defense made by a mere handful of brave and hardy pioneers, nobly supported by our ever loyal, ever trusty and ever faithful friends, the Klamaths, and those patriotic heroes, Modocs, led by the old hereditary chief, Schonchin. These people here with us today, native Americans, people who but a few years ago were the wild men of these wild forests, proved themselves true patriots and through these trying times stood shoulder to shoulder with the white pioneer, and were among the first to go to the rescue of our people in distress."

Lieutenant Colonel Frank Wheaton, commanding the district of the lakes, at once hastened to the scene of hostilities and assumed command in person. He established headquarters near Crowley's ranch; preparations were at once made to proceed against the hostile Modocs who had moved south to their stronghold in the Lava Beds. These Lava Beds, lying principally in Modoc county, California, bordering Tule lake on the south, are certainly most hideous freaks of nature. Here is, indeed, a feast for the eyes of those who prefer the grewsome, uncanny and repulsive to the sublime and beautiful. Of the latter the Lava Beds are the antipodes. They are, in fact, practical Gibaltars, as was proved in this campaign when a mere handful of half starved Modocs held at bay for many months a large force of United States troops aided by volunteers and Warm Springs Indian allies. Had the Modocs been plentifully supplied with food and ammunition it appears quite probable that it would have taken twice as long to dislodge them as it did the Spaniards to wrest from the Moors the historic Gibraltar, and that consumed a period of 800 years. The intricate formation of the Lava Beds needs to be seen in close proximity to be duly appreciated; and it is well worth time and trouble to those seeking the outre and bizarre to visit this world-famous locality. To those who anticipate doing so we here tender a bit of advice; provide yourself with a guide and a plentiful supply of rattlesnake bite antidote; the Lava Beds are certainly the fatherland of that venomous reptile.

Howitzers were brought in and on January 16, 1873, camp was broken and the cavalry, infantry and artillery forces, together with the volunteers, started on their memorable campaign of the Lava Beds. The forces under Colonel Wheaton numbered about 400, of which 225 were regulars, and the others volunteers. Opposing them were about 150 Indians, according to Colonel Wheaton's estimate. But the natural stronghold was such that everything favored the Indians.

Colonel Wheaton attacked the Modocs on the 17th of January and lost sixty-five men—sixteen killed and forty-nine wounded, accomplishing very little except making a reconnaissance developing the Modoc strength and position. In his report of the battle Colonel Wheaton said:

We fought the Indians through the Lava Beds to their stronghold, which is in the center of miles of rocky fissures, caves, crevices, gorges and ravines, some of them one hundred feet deep. In the opinion of any experienced officer of regulars of volunteers, 1,000 men would be required to dislodge them from their almost impregnable position, and it must be done deliberately with a free use of mortar batteries. The Modocs were scarcely exposed at all to our persistent attacks; they left one ledge to gain another equally secure.

I have been 23 years in the service of the government, and have been employed a greater portion of that time on our remote frontier, and generally engaged in operating against hostile Indians. In this service I have never before encountered an enemy, civilized or savage, occupying a position of such great natural strength as the Modoc stronghold, nor have I ever seen troops engage a better-armed or more skillful foe.

Owing to the conditions described in the report none, or very little, injury was inflicted on the Indians. The troops taking part in this battle were: Regulars—Company C, 21st Infantry; Company B, 21st Infantry; the former commanded by Captain C. H. Burton, the latter by Lieutenant John M. Ross; detachment of Company F, 21st Infantry; Company F, 1st cavalry; Captain D. Perry; Company G, 1st cavalry, Captain R. F. Bernard; Company B, 1st cavalry, Captain James Jackson; Companies A and B, Oregon Volunteers, the former commanded by Captain H. Kelly; the latter by Captain O. C. Applegate; Twenty-fourth California Volunteer Riflemen, Captain J. A. Fairchild.

It was estimated at the time that more than a ton of lead was poured into Captain Jack's stronghold. Yet, incredible as it may appear, only one Indian was hit, while sixty-five regulars and volunteers were killed and wounded. The dead were left where they fell, but the wounded with one exception were carried out. Two men were killed in an attempt to drag this poor fellow to a place of safety. The spot where he lay was lost owing to the fog, and he was, perforce, left in the hands of the merciless savages. He belonged to Captain Perry's troop of United States cavalry.

This battle was an emphatic defeat for the troops. Colonel Wheaton was forced to retreat to a suitable camp on Lost river. The Modoc insurrection had now assumed a quite formidable aspect. Three hundred more troops were asked for by Wheaton. They were at once dispatched to reinforce him. Before they arrived orders were received from the war department to suspend hostilities, indicating a desire to again resort to peace measures. Considerable humiliation was felt by the troops over this order. Practically it was to so place the troops that they might protect the citizens, but if possible to avoid war. The order was received January 30, 1873, and was the first step toward peace in the endeavor to accomplish which General Canby and Dr. Thomas were massacred.

From the date of these instructions from Washington suspending military operations against the Modocs until April 11, 1873, active efforts were made to secure this desired peace. Commissioners were appointed to confer with Captain Jack and secure his consent to live upon a reservation with his tribe. To the commissioners was given great latitude in treating with these Indians. They were authorized to grant a separate reservation if the Modocs would consent to lay down their arms and live peaceably.

General Canby, who had up to this period remained at headquarters, at Portland, acted with the commissioners and at once joined the forces in the field. February 15th he reached Linkville. The day following he went to Dorris ranch, California; later to Fairchild ranch and Van Bremer's ranch. February 18th the commission was organized. It at once tried to open communication with Captain Jack. During the succeeding few weeks there were many changes in the personnel of the commission. For nearly two months they were unsuccessful in making satisfactory arrangements with the Indians. Captain Jack and his followers would occasionally promise to meet for a "talk", but there was, inevitably, some excuse put forward; the proposed meeting did not materialize. During this prolonged period the military authorities were so disposing their forces as to cut off all avenues of escape for the Modocs. The disposition of the war department is shown by the following extract from a telegram from General W. T. Sherman to General Canby, dated March 13, 1873:

It is manifestly desired by all in authority that this Modoc affair should be settled amicably, and for that reason I advise you to exercise considerable patience. * * * But should these peaceful measures fail, and should the Modocs presume too far on the forbearance of the government and again resort to deceit and treachery, I trust you will make such use of the military force that no other Indian tribe will imitate their example, and that no other reservation for them will be necessary except graves among their chosen Lava Beds.

At last, on April 11, 1873, Captain Jack consented to a conference. General Canby and three commissioners, Rev. Dr. Eleazer Thomas, A. B. Meacham and L. S. Dyar set forth to meet the Indians, accompanied by T. F. Riddle and Indian wife, Toby, or Winema. The details of the fearful tragedy that ensued are told officially by Colonel Alvan C. Gillem in his report to the adjutant general of the United States army as follows:

Headquarters Modoc Expedition,

Camp South of Tule Lake, April 11, 1873.

Sir—It is with the most profound sorrow that I have to inform you of the death of Brigadier General E. R. S. Canby, U. S. A., which occurred today at 1:30 p. m., about one mile in front of this camp under the following circumstances:

For a day or two communication between the Indians and the peace commission had been virtually suspended. Yesterday morning an Indian (Boston Charley) came into camp and informed the commission that Captain Jack would "talk." In order to avoid all misapprehension, the commission sent their interpreter (Frank Riddle and his squaw, Winema) into the Indian camp; they returned in the evening and reported that Captain Jack said he would not meet the commission, nor come out of his stronghold again until the troops were removed from the vicinity. An Indian returned with Riddle and confirmed his statement. This morning, however, the Indian, Boston Charley, asserted that Riddle (the interpreter) had not told all that Captain Jack had said, and asserted that Jack had agreed to meet General Canby, myself and the commission at a tent that had been pitched about a mile in front of this camp. In order to reconcile these conflicting statements the two Indians, Boston and Bogus, were sent back to the Indian camp. They soon returned and said that Jack would meet five of us—General Canby, myself and three commissioners, at the tent. After duly considering the subject it was determined to accept the proposition. I was too ill to accompany the party, and before leaving the interpreter brought the commissioners to my bedside and asked me to bear witness that he had warned them that there was danger in going out; however it was decided to go.

At 11:06 a. m., the party left camp. I directed the signal officer to keep a strict watch on the tent and to inform me of everything that occurred. At 1:30 p. m., the signal officer brought me information that Major Mason's camp on the east had been attacked and two officers probably captured. (This afterwards proved to be incorrect.) Convinced that treachery was intended, I sent for Assistant Surgeon Cabaniss, who volunteered to take a note to General Canby. I could not send a verbal message as many of the Indians understood English. I had written but a few words when shots were heard, and officers from the signal station brought the information that General Canby and the peace commissioners had been murdered. The troops were under arms at once and advanced. I found the bodies of General Canby and the Rev. Dr. Thomas about seventy yards from the tent. Mr. Meacham was near, severely.

if not mortally wounded; all were stripped. Mr. Dyar, one of the commissioners, escaped unhurt, having a small pistol which he drew on his pursuer.

The remains of General Canby and Dr. Thomas will be sent to Yreka tomorrow, in charge of Lieutenant H. R. Anderson, A. D. C., to the general.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALVAN C. GILLEM,
Colonel First U. S. Cavalry, commanding
Modoc Expedition.

To Adjutant General U. S. Army.

In this report of Colonel Gillem we have the bald facts. There were many sensational details of this tragedy which were subsequently brought out in evidence at the trial of the captured assassins. One of the most important witnesses was T. F. Riddle, the interpreter, and the following is an extract from a portion of his evidence:

Mr. Meacham, then he made another speech, and he told Captain Jack: "Jack, let us talk like men and not like children," and he sort of hit him on the knee or shoulder once or twice, or tapped him—he said, "Let us talk like men and not talk like children." He said; "You are a man that has common sense, isn't there any other place that will do you except Willow creek and Cottonwood?" And Mr. Meacham was speaking rather loud, and Schonchis told him to hush; that he could talk a straight talk; to let him talk. Just as Schonchis said that, Captain Jack rose up and stepped back, sort of in behind Dyar's horse. I was interpreting for Schonchis, and I was not noticing Jack. He stepped a few steps out to one side, and I saw him put his hand to his bosom like—

* * * Well, he stepped back and came right up in front of General Canby and said: in Indian, "All ready, boys—" at we—that is "All ready," and the cap busted, and before you could crook your finger he fired. * * * Yes, sir, and after the cap busted, before you could crook your finger, he fired and struck General Canby under the eye, and the ball came out here (showing—in the neck under the chin.) I jumped and ran then, and never stopped to look back any more. I saw General Canby fall over, and I expected he was killed, and I jumped and ran with all my might. I never looked back but once, and when I looked back Mr. Meacham was down, and my woman was down, and there was an Indian standing over Mr. Meacham and another Indian standing over her, and some two or three coming up to Mr. Meacham. Mr. Meacham was sort of lying down this way (showing) and had one of his hands sticking out. * * * They commenced firing all around. I could not tell who was firing except Schonchis, here; I saw him firing at Mr. Meacham, but the others were kind of up in behind me, and they were firing and I did not turn around to look back to see who it was. I thought it was warm times there.

Since the assassination of President Lincoln probably no news had created such intense excitement throughout the country as did this murder of General Canby and Peace Commissioner Thomas by these perfidious Modocs. To the four winds of heaven was scattered the policy of "peace." It was war to the knife and knife to the hilt. In recapitulation of what has been said concerning this fiendish deed it may be said that Boston and Bogus Charlie had come in on Thursday the 10th, and solicited an interview at the cave, a mile beyond the tent, at exactly the same spot where they had previously attempted to entrap the commission. The members refused to go to this place but were willing to compromise on the tent as neutral ground. It is undeniably true that both Riddle and his wife advised the commission not to go, insisting that treachery was in the air, but they were overruled by Dr. Thomas and General Canby who could not believe that after their kind treatment of the Indians harm could befall them.

"They are firing on the peace commission!"

Such was the terrible cry that echoed through the camp and such was the fearful fact. Hastily the soldiers responded to the long roll and swept onward toward the fateful conference ground. Colonel Miller's battery E, Fourth artillery, was in the van, and cavalry and infantry followed, crossing the lava field to the scene of the affray—Colonel Miller and Lieutenant Leary with their own men at the double quick, closely followed by Major Throckmorton, commanding batteries K and M, with Lieutenant Harris taking the right center, and Captain Wright, Company E, and Lieutenant Howe on the extreme left. These companies followed each other so rapidly that it was difficult to determine which was ahead.

Too late! That which was sought to be prevented had been committed. General Canby had been killed by Captain Jack—shot in the eye, the ball ranging downward, emerging through the jaw and breaking it. He had, also, received a stab under the right ear, dislocating the neck, probably, as it was found to be broken.

Dr. Thomas was shot by Boston Charley who that very morning had eaten breakfast with him, and had walked with him to the field of death. Truly a hellish deed, equalling in atrocity the barbarity of ancient piracy. He was shot through the right lung, this wound itself being almost instantly fatal. Having fallen he was again shot through the head, the ball entering rather back of the apex of the crown. He was seen to throw up his hands after the first shot, as he fell to his knees, and heard to exclaim, "Don't kill me!" The second shot put an end to his life. He died without a struggle; a peaceful smile was on his lips when found, as though he was asleep.

From the dead let us turn to the living. Schonchin attacked Mr. Meacham. The first shot crashed through his arm and disabled it, probably knocking him down. Another bullet shaved away an eyebrow and cut the bridge of the nose, wounding the bone and cartilage quite seriously. Another bullet struck him at the lower lobe of the left ear, glancing along the skull and emerging some three inches above. An attempt had been made to scalp him, but further than cutting a large ugly gash partly around the head, the fiends had not succeeded. Meacham was taken to the hospital where every attention was paid him. Aside from the other injuries mentioned a bullet had shattered the forefinger of the left hand.

Let us in this place consider the miraculous escape of Mr. Dyar. He was standing by his horse when the first cap exploded. Instinctively alive to this sudden exhibition of treachery, like a deer he sprang past the rocks in the direction of the camp. He was closely followed by Hooka Jim who fired two shots at him. Dyar turned and presented his derringer. The cowardly savage bounded away in the opposite direction; Dyar resumed his run for the camp which he gained in safety.

The advance of the troops was checked by Colonel Miller who, just as the bodies were found, had received from Major Green, commanding the forces in the field, through Acting Adjutant Lieutenant Taylor, an order to assume command of the whole line. Just as the cave around the bend was reached, where Jack had tried to get the conference, could be seen, three-fourths of a mile away, the flying Modocs, some mounted on horses captured from the commissioners. It was impossible to come up with them before they reached their stronghold, and as the canteens and haversacks were empty of water and provisions, it was necessary to return and await for another day of reckoning.

During the progress of the war Wi-ne-ma, of whom we have spoken, was selected as the official interpreter by the government. She was one of the brightest of the Indian tribe, the daughter of a Modoc chief. Her early life had been passed on the lakes of the Klamath country and along their shores. She used to gather with the great peace parties on Link river, at the foot of the falls, now the present site of Klamath Falls. By her beauty in early days and extraordinary intelligence, Wi-ne-ma won the heart and hand of her present white husband. They were legally married and when the Modoc War broke out she enlisted in the cause of the white people, as a peacemaker, however, between two races. Wi-ne-ma still lives. She resides on the Klamath reservation. The romance of her life has passed and she now goes by the simple name of Toby Riddle, after having served the white race faithfully and beyond all compensation.

General Canby began his military career as a cadet at West Point in the summer of 1835, graduating in 1839. He was continuously in the service for thirty-eight years, passing through all the grades to Major General of Volunteers, and Brigadier General of the regular army. He served in early life with marked distinction in the Florida and Mexican wars, and the outbreak of the Civil War found him on duty in New Mexico where, after the defection of his seniors, he remained in command and defended the country successfully against a formidable inroad from the direction of Texas. He was afterward transferred east to a more active and important sphere, where he held various high commands, and at the close of the Civil War was in chief command of the military division of the west. In the campaign he received a serious wound, but he had the honor to capture Mobile and compel the surrender of the rebel forces in the southwest. Following the close of the war he was repeatedly chosen for special command. In 1869, when fatigued by a long and laborious career, he consented to take command of the Department of the Columbia, where he expected to enjoy the repose he so much courted. The following tribute to General Canby is found in general order No. 3, issued by command of General W. T. Sherman, at Washington, April 14, 1873:

"He responded to the call of his government with alacrity, and has labored with a patience that deserved better success, but, alas! the end is different from that which he and his best friends had hoped for, and he now lies a corpse in the wild mountains of California, while the lightning flashes his requiem to the furthest corners of the civilized world.

"Though dead, the record of his fame is resplendent with noble deeds well done, and no name on our Army Register stands fairer or higher for the personal qualities that command the universal respect, honor, affection and love of his countrymen."

Following the massacre of General Canby and Dr. Thomas a vigorous campaign against the Modocs was inaugurated, such an onslaught as should have been commenced months before. The "shilly-shally" of "peace" was now exchanged for the stern reality of hot and impetuous war.

Of this campaign space forbids an exhaustive account, but we shall confine ourselves to the salient features of this last, but decisive movement against the treacherous tribe led by Captain Jack, a name that must go down in Indian history, as has that of Blackbeard, the inhuman piratical monster of the Spanish Main, in the story of the sea.

The perfidy and treachery of the savages must be punished to the fullest extent. Authorities at Washington who had so long dallied with the "peace policy," now forwarded instructions of no uncertain interpretation. The Modocs must be exterminated or captured—their power broken to the utmost. Colonel Gillem, of the first cavalry, had assumed command of the forces in the field. April 14th he began an advance into the Lava Beds. Realizing the impossibility of taking the Modoc stronghold by assault, this officer determined to surround the hostiles, thus saving his own men and preventing the escape of the Indians. Fighting began on the 15th. Mortars and howitzers played no unimportant part. During the day the loss to the soldiers was Lieutenant Eagan, wounded; three men killed and nine wounded.

On the 16th lines were advanced and fighting was severe. The command was pushed to the immediate vicinity of the caves held by Captain Jack. A junction was formed by the commands of Majors Green and Mason; the water supply of the Indians was cut off. During the night of the 16th firing was almost continuous. The hostiles attempted to break through the lines to procure water; they were unsuccessful. On the 17th the stronghold was captured, but the savages had fled; they were not discovered until the 20th. Then they were located about four miles south of their old stronghold. Here they remained until compelled to come out for water. No more fighting occurred until the 26th. Then a company under command of Captain Evan Thomas fell into an ambushade and was annihilated, the most disastrous event of the war. The party consisted of six commissioned officers, sixty-four enlisted men and fourteen Indian scouts, sent out by Major Green to reconnoiter the position of the hostiles with a view of taking a mortar battery by pack train through a lava bed to a sand hill, near the center, about five miles distant from the camp. The objective point was reached without difficulty by noonday; the party halted for rest and refreshment. No Indians had been encountered; no resistance appears to have been expected. A general feeling of security seems to have prevailed among the officers. A signal sergeant was preparing to send a message back to camp announcing the success of the enterprise when a few shots in close proximity announced the presence of the enemy.

Though surprised the officers immediately sprang to action. However, a well directed fire from the Indians by this time caused a large number, probably two-thirds of the enlisted men, to break and fly in a most cowardly manner. The officers, thus deserted by their men, rallied the few brave spirits, mostly non-commissioned officers, and fought the foe with undaunted courage. They were all found, killed or wounded, where they had so nobly, but ineffectually fought.

General Jeff C. Davis, who a short time later assumed command in the Lava Beds, in his report of the affair said: "The result was conspicuous cowardice on the part of the men who ran away, and conspicuous bravery and death on the part of the men and officers who stood."

Major Green went at once to the scene of the fighting. Captain Thomas' command was entirely disorganized and scattered. In the lava chasms were found the dead bodies of Captain Thomas, Lieutenant A. B. Howe, Lieutenant Thomas F. Wright, Lieutenant Arthur Cranston and thirteen enlisted men. Lieutenant George M. Harris, Acting Assistant Surgeon B. Swing and sixteen enlisted men were found wounded where they had so gallantly made a stand. The bodies of four Modoc Indians were found near the scene of the fighting.

General Davis arrived at the Lava Beds May 2d. It had been his intention to make another effort to dislodge the Indians immediately. But the recent defeats, culminating in the disaster of April 26th, had exerted a demoralizing influence among the troops, and General Davis decided to await further developments before resuming active operations. We shall now tell the story of the rest of the campaign in General Davis' own words as related in his report:

The order assigning me to the command of the department of the Columbia was dated April 14, 1873; it was received at Indianapolis, Indiana. I at once left for the Lava Beds and reached the camp of the troops on the 2d of May. I found them laboring under great depression of spirits; their cheerless winter camps, heavy losses and repeated failures, had doubtless diminished their zeal and confidence to a considerable extent before the disaster to Thomas' command. Its effects were very visible upon the morale of the command; so much so that I deemed it imprudent to order the aggressive movements it was my desire and intention to make at once upon my arrival, in order to watch the movements of the Indians. During the few days required to examine into the condition of affairs, and to effect a re-organization of the command, made necessary under the circumstances, as well as by the arrival from San Francisco of Captain Mendenhall's command, I sent a couple of friendly Indian squaws of the Modoc tribe into the Lava Beds. After two days they returned almost exhausted from fatigue, having searched the country quite thoroughly. They reported the Indians gone but recently. A few Warm Spring Indians sent out the next day confirmed their report.

Hasbrouck's and Jackson's companies, with the Warm Spring Indians, all under command of the former, were immediately sent out in pursuit, and signs of Indians were found near Sorass lake, where the troops camped for the night. On the morning of May 10th the Indians attacked the troops at daylight; they were not fully prepared for it, but at once sprang to their arms and returned the fire in gallant style. The Indians soon broke and retreated in the direction of the Lava Beds. They contested the ground with the troops hotly for some three miles.

The object of this hasty movement of the troops was to overhaul the Indians, if out of the Lava Beds, as reported, and prevent them from murdering settlers in their probable retreat to another locality. This object was obtained and more. The troops have had, all things considered, a very square fight, and whipped the Modocs for the first time. But the whole band was again in the rocky stronghold. So soon as the result was made known to me by signals, I immediately ordered the troops to be dismounted and follow the enemy on foot, the horses to be sent to a safe place for grazing, and never lose sight of him. Water and provisions were ordered up also. Major Mason, with his own and Mendenhall's foot artillery, was ordered to leave behind suitable camp guards, and to move directly through the Lava Beds, so as to take a position as near as possible to the enemy, and opposite the one assumed by Hasbrouck's command. This scramble (it can not be properly called a march) of fourteen miles was exceedingly creditable to the troops and commander, Major Mason.

The Indians were now closely threatened with attacks from two sides, sandwiched but not surrounded. All the troops by this time were much recuperated and inspirited, and I resolved to carry out my plan, formed when I first arrived. This was to move them, the troops, all into the Lava Beds and form a series of bivouacs from which they could fight when opportunity offered, or could rest and take things easy, like the Indians. The pack trains engaged in supplying the troops already there were ordered to be increased with this view, but the Indians had already become exhausted in watching the forces threatening them so persistently since their fight at Sorass lake that a retreat or capture was inevitable. The chief could no longer keep his warriors up to the work required of them; lying on their arms night and day watching for an attack. These exactions were so great, and the conduct of the leader so tyrannical, that insubordination sprang up which led to dissensions and final separation of the band into two parties; they left the Lava Beds bitter enemies. The troops soon discovered their departure and were sent in pursuit. Their trails were found leading in a westerly direction. Hasbrouck's command of cavalry, after a hard march of some fifty miles, came upon the Cottonwood band and had a sharp running fight of seven or eight miles. The Indians scattered in order to avoid death or capture. The cavalry horses were completely exhausted in the chase, and night coming on, he withdrew his troops a few miles distant to Fairchild's ranch for food and forage:

Indians captured in this engagement expressed the belief that this band would like to give themselves up if opportunity were offered. When given this, through the medium of friendly Indians, they made an effort to obtain terms, but I at once refused to entertain anything of the kind; they could only be allowed safe conduct through the camp to my headquarters when they arrived at the picket line. They came in on the 22d of May and laid down their arms, accompanied by their old men, women and children; in all seventy-five. It had been rumored for a day or two that Jack's party had taken a different direction from this band. These captives confirmed this report, but from them I could learn only enough to satisfy me that he and his band had fled in one of two directions; north, in the Pit river country, or east, toward Goose lake, either course endangering the lives of citizens and destruction of property. The mounted troops were all drawn, by recent operations, west of the Lava Beds, and this band of the marauders was yet at large, probably about 100 miles from us, perhaps on the rampage, enjoying an Indian's luxuries in the settlements outside of reservations.

In order to meet this emergency the cavalry force, including Indian scouts, was divided into three detachments under Captains D. Perry, H. C. Hasbrouck and James Jackson; Major John Green commanding the whole. All were ordered to rendezvous as soon as possible at Boyle's camp, east of Tule lake. This movement would require at least three days. To learn the exact whereabouts of the Indians was now very important, and I determined to accept of the offered services of a Modoc captive; one who up to the time of their separation was known to be in the confidence of his chief, and could lead us to the hiding place of the band. He was an unmitigated cut-throat, and for this reason I was loath to make any use of him that would compromise his well-earned claims to the halter. He desired eight others to accompany and support him, under the belief his chief would kill him on sight; but three others only were accepted and those of the least guilty ones. (Hooka Jim is the one referred to as the "cut-throat.") They were promised no rewards for this service whatever. Believing the end justified the means, I set them out thoroughly armed for the services they were to perform.

Before the last of the Modocs were taken into custody, the troops were aided to a considerable extent in capturing the remainder of the band by four Modocs who had participated in the Canby massacre. These were Steamboat Frank, Hooka Jim, Bogus Charley and Schacknasty Jim. They had seen the handwriting on the wall and volunteered their services in running to earth Captain Jack and the remnants of his band. For this service they were not included in those selected for trial for the murder of General Canby and Dr. Thomas, although they were, possibly, equally guilty with the others. We now resume the report of General Davis:

After nearly three days' hunting they came upon Jack's camp on Willow creek, east of Wright lake, fifteen miles from Applegate's ranch, to which I had gone after separation from them at Tule lake, to await their return and the arrival of the cavalry. The scouts reported a stormy interview with the angry chief. He denounced them in severe terms for leaving him; he intended to die with his gun in his hand; they were squaws, not men. He intended to jump Applegate's ranch that night, the 28th, etc. On the return of these scouts I immediately sent Captain E. V. Summer, aide-camp, back to the rendezvous at Tule lake with orders to push forward Captains H. C. Hasbrouck's and James Jackson's commands to Applegate's ranch, with rations for three days in haversacks, and pack mules with ten days' supply. All arrived and reported by 9 o'clock a. m., the 29th, under command of Major John Green, their veteran cavalry leader since the commencement of the Modoc War, in excellent spirits. The impenetrable rocky pedregal was behind them; the desperado and his band were ahead of them in comparatively an open country. After allowing the animals an hour's rest the pursuit was renewed, and about one o'clock p. m., Jack and band were jumped on Willow creek near its crossing with the old emigrant road. This stream forms the headwaters of Lost river. It was a complete surprise. The Indians fled in the direction of Langell's valley. The pursuit from this time on until the final captures, June 3d, partook more of a chase after wild beasts than war; each detachment vying with each other as to which should be first in at the finish.

Lieutenant Colonel Frank Wheaton, Twenty-first Infantry, reported to me in compliance with his orders from Camp Warner, on the 22d, at Fairchild's ranch. He was placed in command of the district of the lakes and the troops comprising the Modoc expedition. After making necessary disposition of the foot troops and captives at Fairchild's ranch, he came forward to Clear lake and joined me at Applegate's with Perry's detachment of cavalry; these troops were at once sent to join in the hunt. Most of the band had by this time been run down and captured, but the chief and a few of his most noted warriors were still running in every direction.

It fell to the lot of these troopers to capture Jack. When surrounded and captured he said his "legs had given out." Two or three other warriors gave themselves up with him. Though called for, no reports have been received of these operations from the different detachment commanders, hence details can not be given. As soon as the captives were brought in, directions were given to concentrate the troops, captives, etc., at Boyle's camp on Tule lake. There the Oregon Volunteers who had been called into the field by the governor, turned in a few captives they had taken over on their side of the line. It is proper to mention in this connection that these volunteers were not under my command. They confined their operations to protecting the citizens of their own state. Yet on several occasions they offered their services informally to report to me for duty in case I needed them. No emergency arose requiring me to call upon them.

By June 5th the whole band, with a few unimportant exceptions, had been captured and was assembled in our camp on Tule lake, when I received orders from the general of the army to hold them under guard until further instructions as to what disposition would be made of them.

The Modoc War was ended. The following table shows the number of killed and wounded soldiers and citizens participating therein:

	Killed.	Wounded.	Total.
Officers .....	7	4	11
Enlisted men .....	39	61	100
Citizens .....	16	1	17
Indian scouts .....	2	2	4

Following the capture of the hostile Modoc Indians there occurred a deplorable affair on Lost river. A band of Hot Creek Indians, who had taken no part whatever in the war, were being removed to the reservation, when they were set upon by a party of settlers, and six of their number slain. These Indians had always been peaceable, had had no hand in the massacre of settlers, and this attack on them was entirely unwarranted.

After the capture of the Modocs General Davis at once prepared to execute without trial, eight or ten of the ringleaders, when he received instructions from Washington of a contrary nature. In a dispatch to General Schofield dated Tule lake, June 5th, General Davis said:

I had already made arrangements to execute eight or ten of the ringleaders; scaffold and ropes were prepared. I was engaged in determining the exact list, with a view to executing them at sunset tomorrow, when your dispatch was handed me. I have no doubt of the propriety and the necessity of executing them on the spot at once. I had no doubt of my authority, as department commander in the field, to thus execute a band of outlaws, robbers and murderers like these, under the circumstances. Your dispatch indicates a long delay of the cases of these red devils, which I regret. Delay will spoil the moral effect which their prompt execution would have had upon other tribes, as also the inspiring effect upon the troops.

That General Sherman's idea as to the proper disposition of the captured Indians was in accord with General Davis is shown in the following communication dated June 7th:

"It is to be regretted that General Davis was interrupted in his proposed dealing with the Modoc criminals, but the dispatch having been shown to the attorney general, he thinks that no action should be taken until he has furnished his opinion on the subject of their final disposition to the president."

The captured Modocs were taken to Fort Klamath and held under military guard. Before a military commission which convened at Fort Klamath, July 1, 1873, and remained in session until July 9th, Captain Jack, Schonchis, Black Jim, Boston Charley, Barncho alias One-Eyed-Jim and Sloluck, alias Cok, were tried for the murder of General Canby and Dr. Thomas. The members of this commission were Lieutenant Colonel Washington L. Elliott, First Cavalry, president; Captain John Mendenhall, Fourth Artillery; Captain Robert Pollock, Twenty-first Infantry; Second Lieutenant George W. Kingsbury, Twelfth Infantry. Major H. P. Curtis, judge advocate United States Army, served as judge advocate of this commission. Each one of those tried was found guilty. The sentence imposed by the commission was:

"And the commission does therefore sentence them, Captain Jack, Schonchis, Barncho, alias One-Eyed-Jim, Sloluck, alias Cok, Black Jim, and Boston Charley, Modoc Indian captives, 'To be hanged by the neck until they be dead, at such time and place as the proper authority shall direct, two-thirds of the members of the commission concurring therein.'"

The proceedings, findings and sentences of the commission were approved by the commander of the department of the Columbia, August 22, 1873; they were also approved by President U. S. Grant, who named October 3, 1873, as the date of execution. September 10th President Grant modified the sentences of Barncho and Sloluck to life imprisonment, designating Alcatraz Island, harbor of San Francisco, as the place of confinement.

The other four were hanged October 3, 1873, at Fort Klamath. Of these four Captain Jack was the only one who lost his stoical nerve and failed to "die as a man." For this weakness he was upbraided by Boston Charley, one of the condemned. After the quadruple execution the two sentenced to life imprisonment were taken to the island. The other Modocs, 153 in number, including Scar Faced Charley, who died in Indian Territory about 1900, were first taken to Fort McPherson, Nebraska, arriving there October 29, 1873. There were 39 men, 54 women and 60 children. Shortly afterward they were all removed to the Quapaw agency, Indian Territory. Near the buildings at the fort are four headboards bearing the names of those hanged and the date of their execution. Although these monuments are still standing the bodies are not buried there and never were, having been removed immediately after the hanging. This is a fact not generally known.

No punishment was inflicted by the civil authorities for the murder of settlers during the war, although efforts were made to do so. The following telegram explains itself:

Jacksonville, Oregon, October 4, 1873.

To Jeff C. Davis, U. S. A.,

Commanding Department of Columbia, Portland, Oregon:

The hour of the execution of Captain Jack and his co-murderers at Fort Klamath, on yesterday, the sheriff of Jackson county was present with bench warrants and exemplified copies of the indictments of the Lost river murderers, and demanded their surrender to the civil authorities of this state for trial and punishment. A writ of habeas corpus has also been issued by Justice Prime, of the circuit court of Jackson county, commanding that the indicted murderers be brought before him and cause be shown why they are withheld from trial. I respectfully ask that you communicate the proceedings to Washington, and that final action in the premises be taken by order from there.

L. F. GROVER,

Governor of Oregon.

This was communicated to the authorities at Washington, but the request of the governor of Oregon and demand of the civil authorities were ignored. The order had previously been issued to take the Modocs to the east and this order was in no way changed. Following are the names of the Indians indicted by the Jackson county grand jury November 29th and 30th, 1873: Scar Face Charley, Long Jim, Humpy, Little Charley, Dave, Hooka Jim, Old Doctor, One-Eyed Mose, Boston Charley and Little Jim.

Just thirty years after the deportation of the 153 Modoc Indians from the Klamath country to the Indian Territory in 1873—in June, 1903—forty-seven, the remnant of these, returned to the Klamath reservation. Their arrival was reported to be agreeable to the other Indians on the reservation, and they were treated cordially and generously.

CHAPTER V

FROM CLOSE OF MODOC WAR TO THE YEAR 1905.

Following the subjugation of the Modocs in 1873 conditions in the Klamath country again became normal. A small increase in population was noted each successive year during the 70's, but immigration was not large. Settlers devoted their energies almost exclusively to stock-raising. Only a few residents of supposed favored locations attempted to till the soil. A large majority of the people believed the bulk of the land worthless for anything save grazing purposes. Thus conditions existed until about the year 1881. Then an experiment was made with sixty acres of sage brush land on what was known as the Plevna ranch, near Keno. Thirty acres were sown to barley with the surprising result of a yield of thirty-six bushels per acre. The following season other tests were made on uplands with similar favorable results. From that date onward there was annually a steady increase in cereal acreage and the number of settlers engaged in agriculture.

Yet for a number of years after the demonstration of grain growing possibilities, it was still believed by many that grain could only be successfully produced west of Linkville (Klamath Falls.) Practical tests proved the fallacy of this and soon the Lost river, and other valleys, east of the town of Linkville were classed as grain producing sections.

It is undoubtedly true that the settlement of the Klamath country during the 70's and 80's was greatly retarded by land grabbers, colloquially known as "swamp angels." In many instances—far too many—they forced settlers to leave the country and, by their high-handed and presumptuous attempts to secure possession of too much of the best lands prevented settlers coming in. A history of Klamath county devoid of mention of this really serious status would be incomplete; we purpose to present a brief account of this land grabbing.

In 1860 the United States government granted to several states the swamp lands within their borders. This was before there were many settlers in the Klamath country. The purpose of the grant was to place these lands in the hands of the states, who could to better advantage dispose of them and supervise their reclamation. In the Klamath country very little attention was paid to this swamp land grant prior to 1870. Only a few years before the first settler had located within the boundaries of the present Klamath county. But in the year mentioned a bill was introduced in the Oregon legislature, passed, and was signed by Governor Grover making it possible for much of the best land to come under the pernicious control of the "land grabbers." Ostensibly the bill provided for the reclamation of swamp lands in Oregon. It provided for the filing on swamp lands by private parties, who were to pay $1 per acre for the same, twenty per cent. to be paid down; the balance when proof of reclamation should have been made and accepted. No sooner had the ink dried on the governor's signature to the bill than 200,000 acres of Klamath soil was filed upon. The bulk of this land was secured by Quincy A. Brooks, the author of the bill, A. J. Burnett, N. Owens and a few others. Had the land thus filed upon been all swamp land and unfit for cultivation and pasture without reclamation, there would not have been the set-back to settlement which resulted. But much of the soil thus taken was "swamp land" only in the minds of the land grabbers. Some of this land had already been settled upon by homeseekers. Others came and began to till the soil and raise stock on the lands which were high and dry.

Then ensued a long, tedious campaign on the part of the land grabbers to secure titles from the state. They were successful; then began the contest between the settlers who had taken claims and the state which had given away the lands to the land grabbers. The result was extended litigation, the state attempting to wrest from the settlers the lands upon which they were building homes. It was not a contest between the land grabbers and the settlers, but the responsibility and expense of doing this was placed upon the shoulders of the state. The land grabbers were employed by the state to prosecute the cases. Most of the settlers gave up in despair and moved to other parts of the country. They had tilled the soil and engaged in the stock business, trying to build themselves homes. Intending settlers steered clear of the country where such strife was going on and where they were led to believe the titles to all lands was clouded. The few who fought for their rights to a finish—some fourteen or fifteen in Klamath county—won their cases in every instance. But the litigation produced a deleterious effect on the country and retarded its growth as did no other cause.

Those who have read the preceding chapters of this volume have learned of the various county formations of Oregon. For the benefit of those who have not it may be well to state that in 1854 all that portion of Oregon between the Cascade and Rocky mountains was formed into Wasco county, with the seat of government at The Dalles. A little later the present counties of Lake and Klamath became a part of Jackson county. Then in 1874 that part of Jackson county east of the Cascades comprising the present counties of Lake and Klamath, was formed into Lake county, with Linkville as the county seat, the seat of government two years later being removed to Lakeview. The next county remodeling was the creation of Klamath county from the western portion of Lake county; this brings us up to 1882.

Klamath is a name of aboriginal origin, and is the name of a tribe of Indians which has occupied the country since and before the advent of white men. The Indian name, besides the now authentic spelling, has been spelled Clamet, Klamet, Tlemath and Tlamatl.

Agitation for the formation of a new county from the western portion of Lake, began before the 1880 session of the legislature. The moving of the county seat to Lakeview in 1876 had the effect of making a division desirable so soon as the population would warrant it. Although some thought the time had arrived in 1880, the effort along this line was not united and the matter was not brought before the legislature that session. But in the winter of 1881 and 1882 a united effort was put forth and continued until Klamath county was created in the fall of 1882. Mass meetings were held at various points in the western part of Lake county to obtain the sentiment of the people and to devise means to carry their desires to a successful termination. Following are the proceedings of one of these meetings as reported by the Ashland Tidings of December 16, 1881:

Pursuant to notice meeting was called to order at 2 o'clock p. m., B. Price being chosen chairman and T. J. Goodwyn, secretary. After a somewhat lengthy discussion of the bridge question, the propriety of dividing Lake county and forming a new county was submitted to a vote, when it was determined that all present were in favor of such division. A resolution was also passed requesting the secretary to furnish a copy of their proceedings to the Ashland Tidings for publication.

Quite naturally the people of the eastern side of Lake county objected to the dismemberment of their county. Still, this opposition was by no means intense or bitter. They were willing to allow the slicing of their county provided "the western end had taxable property enough to support a county organization," and they argued that this was not the case.

The campaign of the "west-enders" was waged spiritedly throughout the spring and summer of 1882. During the months of July and August a petition to the legislature was circulated asking for the cutting off of the Klamath basin, Langell and Sprague river valleys, to form the new county. This petition was liberally signed and found its way to the legislative halls. The bill was introduced by E. C. Mason, a resident of Goose Lake valley, and in due time passed both houses and was signed by the governor October 17th.

The population of Klamath county at the time of its organization was, probably, about 700 or 800. At the general election held in June, 1882, the precincts of Lake, which were afterward formed into Klamath county, polled 258 votes. A proper multiple to be used for that period in determining population from the voting strength was not over three, which would give the proposed new county a population about as stated. Following is the Klamath county enabling act:

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon:

Section 1. That all that portion of the State of Oregon embraced within the following boundary lines be, and the same is hereby created and organized into a separate county by the name of Klamath, to-wit: Beginning on the south boundary line of the State of Oregon at its intersection with the line between ranges No. 15 and 16 east; thence due north to the south line of township number 32 south; thence due west to the line between ranges No. 11 and 12 east; thence due north to the south line of township No. 22 south, being the south boundary of Wasco county; thence due west to the summit of the Cascade mountains; thence southerly along said summit to its intersection with the line between ranges No. 4 and 5 east; thence due south on said range line to the south boundary line of the State of Oregon, and thence east along said boundary line to the place of beginning.

Sec. 2. The territory embraced within said boundary lines shall constitute a county for all civil and military purposes, and shall be subject to the same laws and restrictions and be entitled to the same rights and privileges as other counties of the state.

Sec. 3. The county seat of Klamath county is hereby located at the town of Linkville, in said county, until otherwise located, as provided in this act, and the county court of Klamath county shall not expend any of the funds of said county for the erection or construction of county buildings until after the first of July, A. D., 1884.

Sec. 4. The county clerk of Lake county shall, within thirty days after this act becomes a law, make out and deliver to the county clerk of Klamath county a certified transcript of all deeds or other records pertaining to real estate in Klamath county, or to any right, title or interest therein, together with a transcript of all liens and mortgages upon real or personal property in said Klamath county, which said transcript when filed in the office of the county clerk of Klamath county shall have the same effect as original records of the county; and the expense of making said transcript shall be paid by Klamath county.

Sec. 5. It shall be the duty of the county clerk of Lake county to make out and deliver to the county clerk of Klamath county, within thirty days after this act shall have gone into operation, a transcript of all taxes assessed upon persons and property within said Klamath county, and which shall remain unpaid on the day that this act shall become a law, and said taxes shall be paid to the proper officers of Klamath county.

Sec. 6. It shall be the duty of the county judges of Lake and Klamath counties to ascertain the amount of indebtedness of Lake county on the day that this act becomes a law; from this indebtedness shall be deducted the value of the county buildings of Lake county, as estimated by said county judges; also the amount of all state taxes assessed in Lake county and remaining unpaid, together with all money then remaining in the hands of the county treasurer of Lake county, school funds excepted. Two-fifths of the remainder is hereby fixed as Klamath county's proportionate share of said county indebtedness, and when said proportionate share shall be ascertained as aforesaid, the same shall be paid without delay to Lake county out of the treasury of Klamath county. And it is hereby made the duty of the county treasurer of Lake county, within thirty days after this act becomes a law, to pay over to the county treasurer of Klamath county, upon the order of the school superintendent of said county, all school funds then in his charge belonging to the several school districts in Klamath county.

Sec. 7. The counties of Klamath and Lake shall constitute one representative district, and the legal voters of said district shall be entitled to elect jointly one representative to the legislative assembly of this state; and the counties of Lake, Klamath and Wasco shall constitute one senatorial district, and the legal voters of said district shall be entitled to elect jointly one senator to the legislative assembly of this state.

Sec. 8. The county of Klamath is hereby attached to the first judicial district for judicial purposes, and the terms of the circuit court of said county shall commence on the third Monday in May and the fourth Monday in August in each year.

Sec. 9. The first term of the county court of Klamath county shall commence on the second Monday after this act becomes a law, and thereafter the regular sessions of said court shall commence on the first Mondays of March, June, September and December of each year.

Sec. 10. It shall be the duty of the Governor, so soon as convenient after this act becomes a law, to appoint for Klamath county, from among her resident citizens, the several county officers allowed by law to said county, which said officers, after duly qualifying according to law, shall hold their respective offices until their successors are duly elected and qualified as provided by law.

Sec. 11. Until otherwise provided by law the county judge of Klamath county shall receive an annual salary of two hundred and fifty dollars, and the county treasurer an annual salary of one hundred dollars.

Sec. 12. At the first general election after this act becomes a law the question of permanently locating the county seat of Klamath county shall be submitted to the legal voters of said county, and the place which shall receive a majority of all the votes cast at said election shall be the permanent county seat of said county.

Sec. 13. As the citizens living within the boundaries of the proposed county of Klamath labor under a great inconvenience in the transaction of necessary business at their present county seat (Lakeview), this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval by the Governor.

Approved October 17, 1882.

Monday, November 6, 1882, the official machinery of Klamath county was set in motion. On that date, in the little town of Linkville, the commissioners' court convened for the first time and formally organized the county government. At this meeting there were present Hon. W. S. Moore, county judge; Stephen Stukel and O. T. Brown, commissioners; Charles Putnam, sheriff, and W. C. Hale, clerk. The business transacted at this initial assembly was the approval of the bonds of the several county officers; the making of arrangements for county records and the appointment of precinct officers.

The first assessment of Klamath county, 1883, disclosed the fact that the taxable property in the new political division was $499,013. The first tax levy was as follows: County purposes, 10½ mills; state, 5½; school, 4; total 20 mills. The county court found it necessary to raise $5,800 upon the assessment roll of 1884. The amount of taxable property was $561,536. The levy was: County purposes, 10 4-10 mills; state, 5 5-10 mills; school, 4 mills; state university tax, 1-10 mill. Total, 20 mills.

The new county began its career in poverty. At first no effort was made to provide county buildings; nothing very elaborate was required. Whenever the county officials had need of a temporary office they generally found a way to provide the same without cost to the county. Finally, however, a court building became an actual necessity. July 8, 1884, a structure for this purpose was leased from G. W. Smith for $20 per month. There was a steadily increasing demand for a jail. In August of the same year the county purchased of W. J. Nichols lots 3 and 4 of block 23, for $200. A contract was let to Paul Breitstein to erect a jail building at a cost of $800; before the close of the year the county had provided a cage for its jail birds.

While immigrants were settling in some other portions of Oregon quite rapidly during the early '80s, Klamath county, being so remote from transportation and trade centers, was overlooked. There was, practically, no increase of population up to 1884; in fact there was no immigration up to that time. Beginning that year, however, settlers began to come in and locate within the boundaries of the new county. Even so late as 1884 when there was quite a settlement in the county, there were few who considered the locality capable of producing crops, mainly on account of frosts. This year, however, quite a number sowed crops and Thomas Martin erected a grist mill on Link river, just above Linkville, the first one in the county and a pronounced success.

While irrigation projects in Klamath county are now working wonders in the development of this section, it is not a new undertaking. In 1884 William Steel came to the Klamath country from Reno, Nevada, and undertook to irrigate a large tract of land. He bought for himself and son-in-law, George W. Wilson, several hundred acres of land, secured a right of way and built an irrigation ditch, taking water from Big Klamath lake. This enterprise brought many settlers and land which could be supplied from this ditch at once increased in value from $1.25 to $10 per acre. Others undertook like enterprises. Vanbrimer Brothers expended thousands of dollars in bringing water from Little Klamath lake for a like purpose, reclaiming quite a scope of otherwise valueless land. The latter enterprise was incorporated in January, 1886, as the Little Klamath Water Ditch Company.

The year 1885 was a prosperous one for Klamath county.

According to the Oregon state census of that year the population of the county was 1,222. The Klamath Weekly Star claimed that the population was double what it had been the year before, as was the actual wealth of the county. This was, probably, an exaggeration, but wonderful advancement had been made. The assessed valuation for the year was $630,915. The entire indebtedness of the county on July 3, of that year, was $4,774.76.

The first header for Klamath county, owned by Naylor & Townley, made its appearance in 1885, and its advent may be noted as a new era for this country. While it was standing in the streets of Linkville it brought fresh to memory the earlier days of California and the first one that was brought to that state, and that, too, when it was by many thought doubtful whether the growing of grain in northern California could be made a success.

The taxable property for 1886 was $709,236, and this was increased the year following to $1,015,559, showing that the country was rapidly developing. The Star of May 13, 1887, said:

"The assessed value of property in the county today will more than double that of 1884. The acreage seeded to grain this season will, also, double that of any previous year in the county. Today we see our valleys dotted here and there with comfortable homes, decorated with green fields of growing grain. The mighty lakes and rivers, by the hand of industry, have been made to contribute to the dry sage brush plains a continuous stream of water converting them into ever green meadows for the benefit of man."

In September, 1887, the county court purchased grounds in Linkville, and decided to erect a court house at a cost not to exceed $7,500. The lots were bought of Mrs. Lizzie Brooks for $500; bids were solicited for the erection of the building at a cost within the amount above stated. At the session of November 25th the contract for this building was let to W. S. Moore & Company for the sum of $3,500. County Judge G. W. Smith strenuously objected to the action of the county court at this time. Upon the commissioners' journal of November 25th appears the following:

"G. W. Smith, county judge of Klamath county, hereby refuses to take any part in letting a contract to build a court house for Klamath county under either of the bids or specifications now on file and being considered by the commissioners, as he does not believe either reaches the wants of this county or is agreeable to the taxpayers to build such a structure as is represented by either bid; and in signing the journal of this day's proceedings I wish it distinctly understood

The population in 1901 was estimated at 5,000. Assessed valuation for 1901 was $2,299,169, about $800,000 more than in 1900.

Klamath county is enjoying a growth in improvement unprecedented in its history. The influx of new settlers was never so great. Of late all stages coming here, besides many private conveyances, have been loaded with homeseekers, timber men and others in quest of different investments. * * * The rush for timber has begun. Dozens are already in the woods, some to locate new claims and others to inspect large tracts owned by individuals for eastern buyers. Reliable information states that hundreds of people, hitherto quietly waiting on the outside for the snows to disappear from the mountains, will soon augment the scramble for Klamath county pine. The growing demand has advanced the price somewhat. The spirit of improvement is rife everywhere in the county. The most important is that of enlarging irrigating canals and building new ones. The pay-roll of the Klamath Falls Irrigation Company, whose canal is being widened, is $1,000 per week. Work is progressing on two ditches near Bly and there is assurance of two more in the vicinity of Bonanza this season. Surveys are in progress for the proposed irrigating ditches for Klamath reservation. Preparations are being made for the building of electric light, water works and sewerage systems for the agency, appropriations for which were made at the late session of congress. Work of construction will begin soon and be pushed as rapidly as possible.

The year 1902 was another era of prosperity for Klamath county. "Times were good; the only complaint voiced was that there was more work to be done than could be accomplished by the limited number of laborers. Money was plentiful and good wages prevailed. In various enterprises was capital invested. Hundreds of men and women, during this year, went into the mountains between Klamath and Goose lakes to take up yellow pine timber land under the timber and stone act.

November 13, 1901, work was begun on the only railroad which so far penetrated Klamath county. This road was built by those interested in the Pokegama Lumber Company. The Officers of the road who were also members of the above named company, were George Mason, president; Hervey Lindley, vice-president, and general manager; J. E. Coffin secretary and Dean Mason, treasurer. This line was named the Klamath Lake Railroad, and was built from Thrall, California, to Pokegama, in the extreme southwestern corner of the county. This road was completed to Pokegama in May, 1903.

While the year 1902 had been a most prosperous one for the county of Klamath, 1903 completely distanced it. Day by day increased the number on the ground. New stage lines were added and the old ones increased their equipment. Filled to overflowing were the hotels of the several towns. Various were the causes which produced this rush. Some came to secure the little government timber land that remained; others sought investments and business opportunities in the towns. The total value of taxable property in 1903 was $2,756,690.

In the spring 1904 the Klamath Canal Company began operations, undertaking to irrigate an extensive tract of land with water taken from Upper Klamath lake. This company was incorporated in San Benito county, California, May 16, 1904. The capital stock was $1,000,000. William K. Brown was the attorney in fact and general agent. The officers were Charles N. Hawkins, president; Paul F. Brown, vice president; John Peterson, secretary; Bank of Hollister, California, treasurer. The directors were Paul F. Brown, Charles N. Hawkins, Frank E. Shore, Thomas S. Hawkins, Nash C. Briggs, all of Hollister, California. In the spring of 1905 arrangements were made for a sale of this plant to the government, as was the case of the other two large irrigating projects.

This irrigation scheme of the government's, involving a contemplated outlay of $4,400,000, is destined to work wonders for the Klamath country. During the past summer (1904) government engineers were in the field and it was estimated by them that the amount of land to be reclaimed will be in the vicinity of 320,000 acres. Nearly all of this land is of the best quality and well adapted to the growing of grain, alfalfa, potatoes and all varieties of vegetables.

This is, probably, the cheapest and greatest irrigation enterprise undertaken by the government in the west. In the Klamath basin it is rapidly assuming substantial form. The people of the region are thoroughly enthused over the project and all conflicting elements have been swept away with the purchase of private interests in other canal projects. T. H. Humphries is the engineer in charge of the work. Mr. Holgate represents the legal department of the government in all its proceedings. These gentlemen have been to California where they asked that state to cede to the government all its unsold swamp land in the basin. The same request was made to the Oregon legislature and granted.

Before the government drains the lakes and marshes contemplated in a portion of the tract it wants title placed with it so that the land may be sold as homestead as soon as the work is complete. The state of Oregon holds title proper under the old swamp land act. The tule lands adjacent to the lakes have already been sold to private interests, and now all of these acquiesce in the government plan.

Upper Klamath lake will be used as an immense storage reservoir for which its situation is admirable. Two other lake beds will be utilized for storage reservoirs for which there will have to be dams, but this work will be at a low figure as the sites are well adapted to the purpose. Upper Klamath lake is at an altitude of 4,142 feet above sea level. It has an area of 65,000 acres, and there is marsh and tule land at the head covering 75,000 acres. This vast swamp is remarkably level, and by lowering the level of the lake three feet the swamp will be drained sufficiently for agriculture. When the 75,000 acres of marsh is drained it will be irrigated, from Sprague and a sister river, which have sufficient volume to irrigate all of this land and fill the great lakes for the irrigation work in lands below.

Lower Klamath lake covers 84,000 acres, the water being of but one to twelve feet in depth. Tule, sometimes known as Rhett, lake and situated near Lower Klamath, has an area of 94,000 acres, with a depth of from ten to twenty-five feet. Clear lake is within six or seven miles of Tule lake. Lost river running out of the former, circulates about 100 miles through the country and returning to Tule lake keeps it replenished. Lower Klamath is but 56 feet less altitude than upper lake. The river running through the valley near Lower Klamath has cut a channel 16 feet deep, and at Keno there is a fall of 50 feet in a mile. The government purposes cutting a channel from Keno down until the falls are destroyed, giving 12 to 15 feet drainage for Lower Klamath lake, which will leave that basin entirely dry. The water of Clear lake will be reservoired and then used for irrigation, the waste being diverted so that it does not reach the Tule lake basin, and by the natural process of evaporation it will soon become dry.

Drainage will be built to expedite this process if necessary. Clear lake will be restrained with a dam 30 feet high. This basin will be made to impound 500,000 acre feet of water which will be distributed by a canal forty miles long. The watershed for Clear lake comprises about 400 square miles, and will be ample to store it during the wet season. Another basin is near Clear lake, known as Horse Fly valley. A dam 70 feet high will be built across one end of this valley, providing a basin that will impound 200,000 feet of water. Its drainage basin is also ample to furnish this volume. A canal fifteen miles long will distribute the water from this reservoir, it reaching the east side of the Lost river valley, and the Clear lake canal on the west side of the same valley. These two canals will water three areas, known as Langell valley, of 15,000 acres; Alkali valley, of 20,000 acres and Swan lake valley of 30,000 acres. The government experts estimate that the two reservoirs will be equal to this task, with a margin of water to spare.

A channel will be taken out of Link river immediately below its origin in Upper Klamath lake. This ditch will have a length of 40 miles and water an area of 60,000 acres in what is known as Klamath River valley; 10,000 acres north of Tule lake, 50,000 acres in Tule lake basin and 84,000 acres in the lower Klamath lake basin. The water that can be controlled in the upper lake is good for 600,000 acres, so that this canal when made sufficiently large, will be ample to fructify the entire region indicated.

The secondary reclamation scheme mentioned which is not connected with the main project outlined, is in the Butte Creek valley, where 25,000 acres of good land are found. The engineers believe that Klamath river may be made to pump sufficient water to irrigate half of this tract, lifting the flow 150 feet, and that storage reservoirs may be constructed so as to irrigate the other half. However, this enterprise is not to be pressed until the other larger work is finished.

The canal begins from Link river, near the head, and is to tap the upper lake half a mile east of Klamath Falls. Since the government entered the field the people who have made contracts with the private canal companies seek to have them release them and many who had signed with these companies have signed with the government.

During the summer of 1904 there was another stir in railroad circles, and it is still quite a live issue. In June, 1904, it was announced that the "Weed" railroad was to be constructed to Klamath Falls. At this time the road was being built in the direction of Klamath county, in California, by the Weed Lumber & Railroad Company, the personnel of which was: Abner Weed, president; B. F. Brooks, secretary; G. H. Wendling, San Francisco, G. E. Bittinger, Los Angeles; E. S. Moulton, Riverside; Mr. Martin and others, directors.

For some time there was much speculation concerning this enterprise. Surveyors were in the field. Early in January, 1905, a definite proposition was submitted by the owners of the Weed road. They agreed to have a road built into Klamath Falls, from Weed, California, by March 31, 1907, providing the people of Klamath county would secure a right of way from the California line, in addition to a bonus of $100,000 to be paid upon the completion of the road. The citizens of the county at once became active and set to work to meet those requirements. In the summer of 1905 the $100,000 was raised, all being subscribed in Klamath county with the exception of $15,000 raised by San Francisco people. This indicates that this road is a certainty.

While the attention of the people of Klamath county is riveted to the building of the Weed railroad and the irrigation project, there is another enterprise that will prove of great benefit to the county. This is the proposed road to Crater Lake by the Medford & Crater Lake Railway Company. The first sod in the construction of this road was turned early in April, 1905. At present the plans are to build into the timber belt west of the mountains, but in time it will be extended into the Klamath county.

The increase in valuation of assessable property in the county for the past year (1905) is the greatest in its history. It has reached a total of $3,163,955, above a valuation in 1904 of $2,755,690, or an actual gain of $506,965. The financial condition of the county is excellent. It probably ranks with the best in the state. While it is nearly four years behind with its warrants, yet it has the full confidence of the commercial world, for its largest warrants, when they can be obtained, are selling at a premium immediately upon issuance.

And now we bring to a close the history of Klamath, the favored county of Oregon. In the earlier days it was the dreaded Modoc country; now it is the county of happy homes. Where once resounded the blood-curdling war-whoop of savage Indians, now live a contented people at peace with all the world. And yet this county is but in its infancy. Could we be permitted to read a history of Klamath county from 1905 to 1950, what wonders would be revealed. But it is quite certain that it would be a record of peace and prosperity; not of war and pioneer hardships.

CITIES AND TOWNS.

Within the boundaries of Klamath county there is only one town that has reached a stage which may be termed "important." This is Klamath Falls, the county seat, a town of 1,100 or 1,200 people. It is the trading center of a large territory; it is rapidly becoming one of the principal towns of southern Oregon.

Two other towns in the county have won their way to municipal government and have been granted charters by the legislature. These are Merrill and Bonanza and rank second and third in importance. Besides these three mentioned are the villages of Fort Klamath, Keno and Dairy, each eligibly located and surrounded by rich farming sections and a country abundant with resources. With the general advancement of the county these are keeping pace. Each has a good school and a few business houses to supply the immediate wants of the people in the vicinity. Aside from the points mentioned are a number of country postoffices near some of which are stores, sawmills, etc. There are nineteen post-offices in the county as follows: Bedfield, Bly, Bonanza, Dairy, Forest, Fort Klamath, Keno, Klamath Agency, Klamath Falls, Langell's Valley, Lorella, Merrill, Odell, Olene, Pelican, Pokagama, Royston, Vistillas and Yainax.

KLAMATH FALLS.

The capital of Klamath county lies in the great Klamath basin at the mouth of Link river, near which point the extensive irrigation canal will receive its water to irrigate 300,000 acres lying in Klamath county and northern California. It is situated on Lake Ewauna, which in Indian lore means "Elbow," the lake at this point assuming that form. Sheltered on the north by a low range of mountains it is seldom extremely cold here in winter; the breeze from many surrounding lakes contribute to make it a delightful place in summer. The elevation of the town is 4,169 feet above sea level.

Klamath Falls was originally called Linkville, and it is as Linkville that the greater portion of this history will treat it. Although the town is an old one it has but recently put on a new appearance and is now forging rapidly to the front. Adjacent to the town are a number of hot springs famed for high temperature and medicinal qualities. While at present Klamath Falls has an electric light plant and water system, they are to be greatly enlarged and improved to meet the demands of a growing city. The town has one of the best equipped telephone systems in the interior. At present Klamath Falls is 33 miles from the nearest railway point which place is reached by stage. The present route to Klamath Falls is via the Southern Pacific Railway to Thrall, in northern California, thence by the Klamath Lake Railway to Pokegama, and thence by stage. There are also daily stage lines from Klamath Falls to Merrill, Fort Klamath, Lakeview and all intermediate points. The Lakeview line passes through Dairy, Bonanza and Bly. The Methodists and Presbyterians each have substantial edifices at Klamath Falls and large memberships. The Catholics are preparing to build a church and school. Fraternal societies are represented by the Masons, Odd Fellows, K. of P., A. O. U. W. and W. O. W.

The pioneer selected this spot by instinct and experience as the natural trade center of this region on account of its striking location and here pitched his tent. In later years the keener business man and close observer cast his lot here willing to bide his time. One bright, sunny afternoon in the year 1858 a solitary individual might have been seen winding his way up the steep mountain side fringing the town on the west. On gaining the summit he accumulated two piles of brushwood and lighted them almost simultaneously. Two columns of smoke rose in the air—the signal for barter—which met an almost immediate response from the Lost river hills. In less than an hour's time native riders and their horses reeking with sweat, had gathered about Mart Frain—pre-eminently the first white trader to visit the present townsite of Klamath Falls.

Linkville, Klamath county's first town, was founded in 1867. George Nurse, its founder, had had for some time previously business relations with the troops at Fort Klamath. Ever since the establishment of this post he had had dealings there, being post sutler, carrying a small stock of goods to sell to the soldiers and trinkets for the Indians. Here he remained for some time, but at last determined to leave the fort and establish himself at another point in the Klamath country. The location he selected was the site of the present town of Klamath Falls, on the east bank of Link river, at the point where it broadens into the Little Ewauna Lake. Securing a "permit" from the government in the spring of 1867 he ran a ferry across Link river, now spanned by the county bridge, at the foot of Main street. This work was done under the supervision of Mr. Edgar Overton and was begun in March. Nelson Stevenson, a carpenter, did most of the work in building the ferry boat.

Under the direction of Overton, who appears to have been interested with Mr. Nurse in his adventures, lumber was rafted down from the fort that summer, and the pioneer building in Linkville, a little box lumber cabin was constructed. It was built on a rocky point on the river's bank, the site of the Brick Store Company's building. About the same time, or possibly a little later, a second cabin was put up just across the street where the Lakeside Inn is now located. Into this building Mr. Nurse moved the remnants of his sutler's store and opened a business which he conducted until 1883. Although Mr. Nurse has always been given credit for founding the town there was associated with him in nearly all his enterprises Mr. Alexander Miller. Mr. Miller had been his old time partner in the sutler business, and when the change was made to Linkville, Mr. Miller was, also, a partner in the venture, although all the business was transacted in Nurse's name.

Of all the frontier stores established in Oregon this was, undoubtedly, the most picturesque and primitive. The "trade" at first was almost exclusively with Indians; the "stock" carried consisted largely of articles that appealed to the natives. These were exchanged for furs. Gradually, however, as settlers flocked into the country Nurse added to his stock until in time the store assumed fair proportions and "Uncle George's store" became a distributing point for a large territory. The land upon which Mr. Nurse built his store, and that adjacent thereto, he secured from the state. His idea from the inception seems to have been to found a future town at this spot, as he at once platted the site and placed lots on the "market." This early platting, however, was very informal and never recorded. Later, in 1878, the townsite was replatted and recorded; the original plat was declared void.

Appropriately enough the town was named Linkville by Nurse because of its location on Link river, the stream which connects Upper Klamath lake with Lake Ewauna. Thus came into existence the future metropolis of the Klamath country. During the four years following the establishment of the store a few other buildings were erected. On nearly all of these the carpentry was done by O. A. Stearns and William Angle. In 1868 or 1869 a saloon for James Barclay and a blacksmith shop for a Mr. Coultos were built. In 1869 a carpenter's shop was put up by Nelson Stevenson and a residence by James Barclay.

This same year the ferry was replaced by a wooden bridge across Link river. It was built by George Nurse at a cost of $1,200 or $1,500. This structure served until the bridge that now spans the river was erected by the county in the middle '80s. In 1869 or the year following, two cabins were erected on the west side of the river for Dave Durvall and another party. This was the beginning of West Klamath Falls. The Linkville postoffice was established in 1872. George Nurse was the postmaster for 12 years. As stated in a previous chapter in the spring of this year a contract for carrying the mail from Ashland to Lake City, California, via Linkville, was let—the first mail facilities that Klamath county had secured. In the fall of 1872 the United States land office was located at Linkville, quite an event in the history of the little town. George Nurse was appointed receiver but did not qualify. The receiver and register who opened the office were George W. Conn and Judson S. Small. This office remained at Linkville until 1879, when it was removed to Lakeview.

Quite slowly grew Linkville during these days; it was not until 1872 and 1873 that its name became immortalized in history's pages by the occurrence of one of the bloodiest Indian wars that ever crimsoned the land. At the time of the outbreak of the Modoc War, in the fall of 1872, Linkville was a town of, possibly, 40 inhabitants. There were the store and a postoffice, a hotel, a blacksmith shop, a feed stable, and a few residences all close to the river at the foot of what is now Main street. Later a drug store was added to the business enterprises of the little town. In previous chapters we have told of the war and the part taken by the citizens of Linkville. It was from this point that most of the war news was sent broadcast throughout the length and breadth of the land; the name of Linkville was upon the lips of every one who read of the bloody deeds enacted in that short, fierce struggle. Linkville was advertised in blood; the most catchy advertising ink in the world.

The next event of importance in the chronological history of this little frontier town was the creation of Lake county in 1874, and the naming of Linkville as the county seat. This honor she held only two years; the seat of government being moved to Lakeview as the result of the election of November, 1876.

Following the close of the Modoc War the surrounding country became more thickly settled and as a result a few more business houses were added to the town during the next few years. Among other enterprises was the establishment of a hardware store by George T. Baldwin, who brought in a stock of goods in 1875. Mr. Baldwin still conducts the business here and his is the oldest commercial establishment in Klamath Falls. Although the Linkville townsite had been platted previously by George Nurse it was not until February 26, 1878, that an official plat was made, the former platting not having been made according to law. The true plat was recorded in the office of the clerk of Lake county January 27, 1879. The townsite comprised 40 blocks, extending from Link river to Ninth street, east and west, and from High to Klamath street, north and south. Following is the acknowledgement made by George Nurse February 26, 1878:

This is to certify that I, George Nurse, am the original owner and proprietor of the land on which the town of Linkville, Lake county, Oregon, has been laid out; that said town is situated on section 32, township 38, south of range 9, east of the Willamette Meridian, and that the above is a correct plat of said town. All former plats of said town made by me are hereby revoked and cancelled, the same not having been recorded as required by law. Block No. 12 is dedicated to common school purposes, and is hereby granted to the school district in which said block is situated. Witness my hand and seal this 26th day of February, A. D., 1878.

(Signed.)

GEORGE NURSE,
Proprietor.

This acknowledgement was made before J. W. Hamaker, notary public. West Linkville, on the west side of Link river, was platted by George Nurse and H. M. Thatcher. The survey was made July 6, 1880, and the plat was recorded in the clerk's office at Lakeview on October 2, 1880.

Nichols' addition to Linkville was platted by W. J. Nichols and Quincy A. Brooks, October 5, 1885. The plat was recorded in the county clerk's office at Linkville, November 20, 1885.

By 1880 we find Linkville grown to be a town of 250 people, according to the United States census taken that year. Two years later we find it a county seat, Klamath county having been created in 1882, and the metropolis named as the capital city. Up to 1884 the growth was slow. In the year above mentioned two events occurred which had an influence for good in the little town. One was the establishment, May 10th, of the county's first newspaper, the Klamath Weekly Star. The other was the building of the county's first grist mill on Link river, just above the town, by Thomas Martin. During the succeeding few years the town enjoyed a steady growth and there was considerable business activity.

Linkville's first church, Presbyterian, was erected in 1885, being dedicated November 15th, Revs. S. Sayers and Robert McLean officiating. Its cost was $2,810.79. In the spring of 1886 we find Linkville's business houses to consist of seven stores, four saloons, three hotels, three blacksmith shops, a brewery, three livery and feed stables, a flouring mill, sawmill, sash and door factory, harness shop, butcher shop, U. S. telegraph office, four doctors, four lawyers and one newspaper. In the fall of 1886 the Star claimed a population of 600 for Linkville, which was, probably, an over estimation. Several business houses were built this year. The lack of banking facilities was a great annoyance to the business men. The cost of building improvements this year totaled $35,800.

The growth of Linkville had been so favorable in the past few years that an attempt was made to secure municipal government. In January, 1887, a bill was introduced in the Oregon legislature to incorporate the town of Linkville. This measure, however, was defeated, and a city government was not established until two years later. At the legislative session of 1889 a city charter was granted to Linkville, going into effect February 25, 1889. The last section of the act granting municipal government reads:

"Inasmuch as improvements are very much needed in the town of Linkville, and said town is greatly in need of municipal government, this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval by the Governor."

W. S. Moore, W. C. Hale and Charles

Graves were named in the act as inspectors of the first election which was held on the first Monday in March. Unfortunately the early records of the town of Linkville are lost and the names of those who first served the town in an official capacity cannot be learned. Following are the names of the citizens who have served as town officers from 1891 to 1905, inclusive:

On the morning of September 6, 1889, occurred Linkville's "big fire," which destroyed almost the entire business portion of the town and entailed a loss estimated at $50,000. The commercial houses at that period occupied that portion of Main street extending from the bridge to the bend of the street. On the east side this was solidly built up as was the greater part of the north side. Both sides of that portion of the street were entirely destroyed. The fire broke out at two o'clock, a. m., the blaze continuing for two hours. Furiously the citizens worked to subdue the flames, but all efforts were unavailing. The only fire protection afforded by the town was a hand pump, and this was, practically, worthless against a blaze of such magnitude. Everything was quite dry and burned readily. The bridge across Link river caught fire, and this was the only structure saved. A severe blow to the little town was this fire; insurance was light and rebuilding did not afterward progress rapidly.

For many years Linkville, and as it was afterward known, Klamath Falls, supported a troop of the First Cavalry, Oregon National Guard. This was troop B, and was organized in 1889. John W. Siemens, formerly a soldier at Fort Klamath, was selected captain, which position he held during the life of the organization.

At the time agitation for incorporation began there was a disposition among many citizens to change the name of the town. "Klamath City" was a name proposed and met with popular approval. Linkville was not distasteful with the exception of the diminutive termination. The town was growing; its citizens expected it to rapidly increase in size, and considered that a name with "city" attached to it would be more appropriate than one terminating with "ville." However, when the bill incorporating the town was passed, "Linkville" was the name used. The change in name to Klamath Falls was brought about by Isa Leskeard. It was suggested by him in 1891. The first mention of Klamath Falls as the name for the town made in print appeared in the Klamath County Star of April 10, 1891, as follows:

"Isa Leskeard, who has been in Portland most of the time since last summer, thinks the name of this town should be Klamath Falls. That name advertises the fact that there are falls here, and thus gives the town an advantage fully recognized as such by other towns similarly situated, though provided with names of the falls at which they stand. 'There is' he said, 'a great deal in the name of a town situated by a heavy cataract,' and we are inclined to think so, too."

In December, 1891, a petition addressed to the first assistant postmaster general was drawn up by Attorney W. C. Hale, of the firm of Cogswell & Hale, setting forth reasons why the present name was objectionable. This petition was placed in the hands of County Surveyor Isa Leskeard, Town Recorder D. C. Brownell and Real Estate Agent Robinson, and names solicited. December 18th the Star said:

"There is an argument of one or two dry-mouthed old settlers that Linkville is well enough known by its present name. But the more spirited believe that the town is not and never will be known by her present name as she ought to be."

The prayer of the petition was granted. The first assistant postmaster general sent to Postmaster C. H. Withrow the following communication which was received March 16, 1892, and it is self-explanatory:

Washington, D. C., March 11, 1892—Sir: The postmaster general has changed the name of your postoffice from Linkville to Klamath Falls, in the county of Klamath and state of Oregon. The new name, however, must not be used until the beginning of the next quarter, nor until you have executed a bond and been commissioned under the new name.

Q. G. RATHBONE,

First Assistant Postmaster General.

Linkville postoffice officially became Klamath Falls April 1, 1892. Although the postoffice had been known as Klamath Falls since April 1, 1892, the incorporated town was still Linkville and remained so until February 7, 1893, when a new charter was granted the town and its official name became Klamath Falls. At the last stroke of 12 on Monday night, February 6, 1893, Linkville ceased to exist except in memory.

Klamath Falls was again visited by fire on the morning of April 8, 1892, when the Grand Central block, in which was conducted a general store, hotel, barber shop and saloon, was burned, with a loss of between $20,000 and $30,000.

A considerable business portion of the west end of the town was consumed by fire Monday, July 2, 1894. The losses were:

Howe & Parrish, $5,000, insurance, $2,800; T. E. Clapp, $4,600; insurance, $3,500; J. D. Fountain, $3,000, insurance, $1,500; Dunn & Ammerman, $2,500, insurance $1,500; F. E. Robinson $2,500, insurance, $1,000; Ky Taylor, $200; Troop B, $2,000; Athletic Club, $150; C. S. Sergeant, $600, insurance, $600; M. H. Daggett, $1,000, insurance, $500.

A census of the town of Klamath Falls taken in April, 1895, gave a population of 452. During 1896 an electric light plant was placed in commission and a system of water works installed. Although the city had not entirely recovered from the business depression incident to that period several business and residence houses were erected in 1896. During the "hard times" which held the whole country in their grasp from 1893 to 1897 Klamath Falls suffered in common with all other towns. Practically, the city was at a standstill; business was dull; enterprise stifled and the town simply existed, waiting for the promised better times to come. With the revival of business conditions throughout the country Klamath Falls emerged from its comatose state and again resumed its place as one of the lively towns of southern Oregon. The streets were crowded with teams and the stores with people; the general animation to be seen on every hand was such as to make the heart glad and the pocketbook full.

The year 1900 was a prosperous one for Klamath Falls. Good crops were harvested, good health was the rule, and favorable railroad prospects (which did not, however, at that time materialize) made the town a lively one. The population this year was 447 according to the federal census. During the few years following conditions were about the same. There was no big rush, but the growth was steady, brought about by the increasing settlement of the surrounding country.

Then came the first intimation that the government was considering a big undertaking for the Klamath country, the irrigation of nearly 300,000 acres of land. This was in 1904. To illustrate the growth of the town it may be said that at the beginning of 1904 the assessable property within the corporate limits of the city was $167,820. At the opening of 1905 it was $231,179, an increase in the year of $63,359. At this writing, summer of 1905, the irrigation project is assured, and the effect on the business conditions of Klamath Falls is highly favorable.

We stated at the beginning of this chapter that Klamath Falls is the favored town of the interior of Oregon. We wish to repeat and emphasize that statement here. Klamath Falls is today a town of between 1,100 and 1,200 people, its population having nearly tripled in the past five years. It will, in all probability, five years from this date, be a city of 5,000 people. A railroad is coming, right of way through the city having been granted; a franchise for a street car system has been secured; new enterprises are being started on every hand; the town is taking on the airs of a city. The business portion of the town is principally built upon one street—a street a mile long and almost solidly built up. Adjacent to the street and along its whole length, is the residence part of the town, in which are beautiful homes, surrounded by handsome lawns and shade trees.

Thirty-eight years ago, in the summer of 1867, when George Nurse opened his "store" at the point of rocks, with his ambition to establish a town at this spot, did he imagine that such would be the conditions in 1905? Can we imagine what Klamath Falls will be forty years hence?

MERRILL.

The town of Merrill, on the historic Lost river, twenty-two miles southeast of Klamath Falls claims to be the second town in importance to the county seat. It is located in a beautiful valley four miles wide and from ten to fifteen miles long. The town was named for N. S. Merrill, who laid it out a number of years ago. The valley is to receive the benefits of government irrigation, and its fertile soil will add materially to Klamath county's great output. The site is ideal; its buildings are substantial, and the surrounding heights, with Mount Shasta's hoary head in the distance, combine to present most picturesque and attractive scenery. Merrill has now one flouring mill, a large sawmill, two large department stores, two hotels, two saloons, two blacksmith shops and a livery stable. The town has no bonded indebtedness, but on the contrary is in excellent financial condition. It is with justice that Merrill boasts of her public school. It is a most substantial building, and the number of pupils enrolled is 67. At present the town numbers between 200 and 300 inhabitants, although one of the youngest towns in Klamath county. Previous to, and for some time after, the founding of the town there was a little place called Gale, about one and three-quarter miles northeast. At Gale was a postoffice, a store owned by James O'Farrell, a blacksmith shop conducted by Mr. Woodcock and the Pioneer hotel. With the founding of Merrill, however, Gale moved into the new town.

Merrill is located upon land the patent to which was issued to Benjamin Van Brimmer at quite an early date. It was not until 1894 that any serious efforts were made to build a town here. It was platted by N. S. Merrill May 22, 1894, and recorded May 28th. The number of acres platted was eighty. The original enterprise was a grist mill built the same year by Martin & Brandon. The building of a mill is a better initiative for a town than the selling of many lots, and during 1894 quite a little village appeared. The mill people built a residence, the second building on the townsite. This was followed by the store of James O'Farrell, blacksmith shop of James Stobie and a number of dwelling houses. A school house 24x40 was erected in 1895. The money for this purpose was secured by subscription in Merrill and the surrounding country. In 1896 a postoffice was established with H. E. Momyre as postmaster. The town was incorporated May 18, 1903, and at that time the town board comprised F. S. Brandon, George Jory, H. E. Smith, W. P. Rhodes and George Offield. S. Ed. Martin was recorder, M. E. Hutchison treasurer and A. Schortgen, marshal.

BONANZA.

This town claims to be next in importance to Merrill. It is 26 miles east of Klamath Falls on Lost river. The town draws a trade from a radius of 15 to 20 miles, and lies in the heart of a rich country, including Langell's, Poe, Alkali and Lost river valleys. Its products consist of cattle and horses, grain, hay, fruits and vegetables. These valleys are a portion of the field for the great government irrigation project, and with the thousands of acres now lying idle, placed in cultivation, Bonanza is destined to become an important town. Already it has two stores, two hotels, two blacksmith shops, a hardware store and two livery stables, a daily mail by stage line east and west, an Odd Fellows and Rebekah Lodge. It has also a Methodist church and a good school. Bonanza is an incorporated town, in good financial condition, out of debt and with a surplus of $500 on hand. The school has an average attendance of 45 and the school property is valued at $1,100. This town was founded in 1876 by J. P. Roberts, at which time he opened a store and conducted it twelve years. The townsite, comprising eleven blocks, was platted by Benjamin Price May 16, 1878, and recorded in the clerk's office at Lakeview. The first addition to Bonanza was platted March 30, 1888, by J. Q. Hamaker. At the opening of 1888 the town had two general stores, two hotels and a blacksmith shop. True, Bonanza's growth has been slow, but at the present writing the town is coming rapidly to the front. During the many years since its founding it has been a trading post and supply point for a rich agricultural country. Now it has aspirations to become a city.

FORT KLAMATH.

This place is 39 miles north of Klamath Falls, at the junction of Wood river and Anna creek, near the head of Upper Klamath lake. It is located in a romantic place, and here was once the seat of government of the reservation. It was a lively military post when garrisoned—especially lively and business-like during the Modoc War. Here, also, was enacted the closing scene of that dark tragedy, the trial and execution of the chiefs of the rebellion. But now most of the buildings of the fort have been abandoned and are rapidly falling to decay. A writer describing the location of Fort Klamath has written that "It looks like an Eden whose first inhabitants were struck with sluggishness for daring to occupy the land before acquiring a patent from the Kingdom of Glory."

The elevation of Fort Klamath is 4,200 feet above sea level. At present it has two general merchandise stores. While the site of the fort was the first spot occupied by white people in Klamath county, the town of Fort Klamath is a new one, having been established only a few years ago. It was platted June 19, 1902, by William T. Shive.

KENO.

This is a small-sized town twelve miles southwest of the county seat, on Klamath river. Besides the business houses necessary for the trade of that section, it is the shipping point for the products of two sawmills. The town is eligibly located on Klamath's big stream and where its waters cease their tranquility and go roaring and foaming down miles upon miles of canyon. The site of the town is a novel and pretty one. Kissing the border of a dense forest on the south, it has for its northern boundary the Klamath river, which at this point is broad and deep. Across the river is a substantial bridge.

Keno has two sawmills, two general stores and a hotel and two blacksmith shops. On the site of Keno was erected one of the first grist mills in the county, but it was not until 1887 that the town of Keno came into existence. March 23, 1888, the Star said: "Keno now has all the requisites necessary to make a first-class town; one grocery and dry goods store, one hotel, one blacksmith shop and a saloon, besides other attractions. Keno will surely become quite a town at no distant date."

October 19, the same year, the Star added: "The town of Keno, although but one year old, has a long street on which are two large, freshly painted hotels, a large mercantile establishment, blacksmith shop, livery stable, saloon, wagon shop, stage station and private residences."

DAIRY.

This town is located 21 miles east of Klamath Falls. It has one general store, two hotels, a harness and blacksmith shop and a saloon. During the year 1885 about 25 families settled in this vicinity and a little village named Dairy came into existence. At the close of the year there was a general store conducted by Mr. Purdum, a blacksmith and carpenter shop and a halting place for travelers where accommodations could be secured. Dairy townsite, consisting of only four blocks, was surveyed by Rufus Moore March 24, 1886. The plat was dedicated April 19th, the same year, by William Roberts, the owner of the townsite, and recorded the day following. Soon after this a number of lots were readily disposed of.

BLY.

This is a postoffice on Sprague river 54 miles north of Klamath Falls. It has two general merchandise stores, two hotels and a saloon. Bly is near the east end of the Klamath Indian reservation, but not on the reservation. The precinct at the last election cast 150 votes; this would indicate a population of about 750 in the precinct. The products of the valley consist of horses, cattle, mules and sheep, although the latter are few in number. At least 1,000 head of cattle, 100 head of horses and a like number of mules are sold annually from this valley. The soil products are oats, red clover, Alsike clover, timothy and natural meadow hay. At least 5,000 tons of hay are cut annually. The schools are good, there being two districts in the valley. J. O. and J. S. Watts, under the name of Watts Brothers, are conducting a large merchandise business at Bly, dealing also in farm machinery and implements. W. F. Reed is postmaster, also proprietor of a hotel. J. W. Wells is a large property owner and a worker for the interests of Bly. In the summer of 1888 Bly consisted of one store and a hotel combined.

OTHER TOWNS.

Klamath reservation, the seat of Indian government, is on the Williamson river, 31 miles north of Klamath Falls. Here is an Indian school, government sawmill and blacksmith shop, and one general merchandise store. W. Huse who visited Klamath agency in the summer of 1901, had this to say of the village in his paper, the Klamath Republican:

"This is an elegant little town and under the energy of Captain Applegate is rapidly growing. During the past year it has had fine systems of waterworks, and electric lights, a large and stylish school building, a well arranged hospital, skillfully conducted by Dr. Hemenway and many other appropriate improvements in the way of streets, shade trees, gardens, etc. In good looks the agency reminds one of an old eastern village where the good taste of citizens has been for years at work adorning their homes and surroundings."

Yainax is a sub-agency of the Klamath reservation, on Sprague river 42 miles northeast of Klamath Falls. Here is located the Yainax Indian school, a store and a blacksmith shop. A postoffice was established at this place in May, 1894, with Frank Terry as postmaster.

The only railway town in Klamath county is Pokegama, in the extreme southwestern portion of the county. It is 36 miles southwest of Klamath Falls. It is the terminus of the Klamath Falls railroad which runs from Pokegama to Thrall, California, on the Southern Pacific, 24 miles southwest. The town is built on a mountain and is surrounded for miles by a dense forest. This place consists principally of tent buildings; but has a hotel, good school, telephone service and is the present terminus of the Oregon Stage Company's line from Klamath Falls. The town derived its name from the Pokegama Lumber Company. We first hear of the place in a letter written in 1901, when work was commenced on the Klamath Lake Railroad. At this time the company purchased the 1,500 acre "Virginia Ranch" on which to lay out a townsite and upon which to build their terminal station.

Lorella lies 38 miles southeast of Klamath Falls. It is a country postoffice having a Methodist church and a sawmill. Formerly Lorella was known as Haynesville. It is located on what was recognized as the "Simp Wilson" domain. Haynesville came into existence in 1887 at which time a postoffice with F. K. Haynes as postmaster was established. Soon afterward a store was opened by J. L. Truett and Mr. Haynes started a blacksmith shop. February 17, 1888, the town was platted by Simpson Wilson. March 14, 1895, it was announced that the name of the postoffice had been changed to Lorella. The reason for this move was that "Haines" and "Haynesville," Oregon, were so near alike that the one was often mistaken for the other.

Whitelake City, on the shores of White lake, about three and one-half miles from Merrill, is known as Klamath county's newest town, although considerable history has been made there. It is a "boom" town and its most enthusiastic supporter can not deny that. Early in September, 1904, J. E. Loy, president; L. G. West, vice-president and F. T. Cook, treasurer of the Oklahoma & Oregon Townsite Company, came to Klamath county to select a site to lay out a town under their scheme. They at once secured an option on 350 acres of land belonging to C. N. F. Armstrong, on Lower Klamath lake, south of Merrill. The purchase price was understood to be $10 an acre. The town was platted May 15, 1905. The drawing, or more properly, the assignment of lots took place June 1, 1905, attended by about 250 visitors. For some little time previously lumber and tents had been shipped in and a few temporary buildings had been run up and a few business houses, on a small scale, opened.

Altamont, about four miles east of the metropolis, contains a general merchandise store and a postoffice. It came into existence in the spring of 1895. Judge Smith officiated as the first postmaster and conducted a small store.

At Olene, a postoffice on Lost river, about 11 miles east of Klamath Falls, is a sawmill, store, hotel and blacksmith shop. It is on a stage line and has a daily mail.

Langell's Valley, a country postoffice on Lost river, is 43 miles southeast from Klamath Falls, and contains a sawmill. Although small it is a historic location in Klamath county.

Vistillas, a postoffice, lies 60 miles east of the county seat, and 35 miles west of Lakeview. It has a semi-weekly mail. The postoffice was established in the spring of 1892.

Odell postoffice on the Des Chutes river, is 110 miles north of Klamath Falls. The office was established in 1901 and was supplied by special mail from Rosland. Eva M. Graves was the first postal official.

In May, 1902, Representative Tongue secured the establishment of a postoffice at Odessa, and Blanche Griffith was postmistress.

Pelican is a summer resort and postoffice on Pelican bay, of Upper Klamath lake, 31 miles northwest of Klamath Falls.

Royston postoffice, 48 miles northeast of Klamath Falls, is on the stage line to the latter point, 10 miles east of Bly and about five miles east of Keno springs. Mrs. Laura E. White was appointed postmistress at the time of the establishment of the office in February, 1893.

Forest postoffice is on Klamath river, 17 miles southeast of Klamath Falls, and about the same distance from Pokegama. It is on the Pokegama-Klamath Falls stage line and has a daily mail.

Bedfield is a postoffice on Lost river, 18 miles southeast of Klamath Falls. L. Pfannstiehl is postmaster.

There is only one "dead" town in Klamath county. That was Merganser. Only the earlier settlers of the county remember the town of Merganser, at one time the rival of Linkville. It was the second town founded in the county and for several years was a place of considerable importance, especially during the Modoc War of 1872 and 1873. The townsite of Merganser was on the west bank of Klamath river, about two miles below the city of Klamath Falls, and the town came into existence in 1870. The cause of the founding of the town in such close proximity to the village of Linkville was that the proprietors of the older town site did not offer inducements to people to start in business in competition with lines already established, and it was impossible to secure lots upon which to conduct business which would in any way interfere with the few lines of business there represented. It was this fact that led to founding of Merganser by J. Roberts and Albert Handy. For a time this new town was known as Lakeport, but shortly after the name Merganser was given it. The naming of the town was brought about in a peculiar manner. Two Scotchmen named Ennes were one day at the little town and in the vicinity shot a merganser duck. The question of a suitable name for the town was being discussed when one of the Scotchmen suggested "Merganser," which was at once adopted. The founding of the town dates from 1870, when the first business house was established, a general merchandise store, by J. P. Roberts and Albert Handy. Following a short delay a postoffice was secured, the second in Klamath county. Mr. Roberts became postmaster. The new town did not enjoy a mushroom growth, although the store did a fairly good business and Merganser became a favorite trading point. Mr. Wallace Baldwin, who resides at Klamath Falls, visited at a time during the Modoc War at Merganser, and has told the writer that at that time the town consisted of the store of Roberts & Handy, the postoffice, a blacksmith shop and the residence of Joseph Penning.

Following the close of the war the town took on new life and other business houses were established. Joseph Penning laid out a townsite in 1875. It was surveyed July 1 by E. C. Mason. The plat was filed for record in the clerk's office of Lake county August 3, 1875. The town's business houses were increased by a harness shop of Robert T. Baldwin, and a large hotel built by John Gleim. A bridge was constructed across Klamath river. A little later Paul Breitenstein began the brewery business in the building which had been occupied as a harness shop, Mr. Baldwin having moved his business to Linkville. But this rival town was doomed; Linkville was destined to become the only place of importance in the county. The Roberts & Handy store at last secured a site in Linkville and moved from Merganser; the blacksmith shop elsewhere and the brewery closed down. The last business establishment abandoned the place and the town passed away. Now it remains only in the memory of pioneers who lived in the country prior to the '80's. The bridge which spanned the river was left to rot and fall away, and the last of this was only a few years ago torn down when the first steamboat was placed in commission on the river, the old structure impeding navigation of the stream.

CHAPTER VII

DESCRIPTIVE.

"A river ran through Eden and watered the garden."—Genesis.

The rough outline of Klamath county may easily be traced on a map, but there is no skillful word-painting so deft that it will portray the beauty, wonder and grandeur of that which nature has within these four cold walls to the north, the east, the south and the west. And yet, no man who has resided there a quarter of a century can truthfully say that he has seen more than a portion of these creations of nature.

Lofty mountains, dressed in stately timber, are seen everywhere below, everywhere above. Broad and attractive lakes sleep here and there, catching the glint of the noonday sun, or lying silent, bathed in the moonlight and reflecting the shades of the heavy shadows above. Rivers, nearly ice cold, from the Cascades and as clear as the air above them dash through canyons and gorges, to afterward meander dreamily through flowery prairies to lose themselves in the lakes; hot springs, warm springs, and cold springs are on every hand. All in all 'tis a delightful country. The natural resources wonderful; game and fish are in abundance. There are medicated hot springs, solfatara or hot earth, fossiliferous deposits and volcanic formations. Such, in general is a not overdrawn picture of Klamath county. The Klamath Republican in 1900 said:

It is said that the early Indians of this country cherished the belief that Klamath county comprised the only and original holy lands with the settlement of Noah and his descendants thrown in. Hence, instead of Mount Ararat, it was the antecedent of Crater Lake on which the ark landed after the freshet of several thousand years ago, B. C. We would suggest that it was amidst the verdant foliage and picturesque beauty of old Fort Klamath set the pace and inaugurated sin by surrounding some forbidden fruit—probably vegetables in the shape of turnips instead of apples. This presumption is suggested by climatic conditions. Therefore Babylon and a few other important towns were strung along Williamson river instead of the Euphrates. Then Sprague river should have the place of the Tigris in history. Klamath Falls, doubtless, succeeded to the old site of Jerusalem and Klamath river in reality is the river Jordan, and so on. All the ancient patriarchs and others mentioned in the scriptures were Indians. That is about the way the first Indians of this country had the situation figured out, and is a version of sacred history quite novel to most of us.

Many residents of Oregon even regard the Klamath region as a vast stock range, encompassed by the seclusion which that term implies—a place memorable in the annals of the state for the Modoc massacres and the fortunes that sturdy stockmen, defying isolation, have made there during many successive years.

But a visit to the county dispels all this. Visions of vast sage plains and foot-hills tenanted only by stock, covered by waving bunch grass fade before this showing, or are rounded out into a variety that is at once pleasing to the imagination and suggestive of prosperity, real and possible in a material sense.

Klamath county is situated in Southern Oregon, east of the Cascade mountains and is among the largest counties in the state. Its mean or plateau altitude is about 4,200 feet above sea level. It comprises an area of 5,854 square miles, 3,732,480 acres divided as follows: 1,206,000 acres of agricultural land; 1,000,000 acres of grazing land; 1,250,000 acres of timbered land and 276,480 acres covered by lakes and marshes.

The county is larger than the state of Connecticut. Klamath is limited on the south by the south boundary of the state; on the east by Lake county; on the north by Crook and on the west by Jackson, Douglas and Lane counties. It is her boast that she has more sunny days in the year, hardier range cattle and sheep and greater forests of soft pine than any other section of America. One such feature would make any locality worth living in; but with all three and many minor ones this county has a future before it of great wealth, great population and great industries. The main deterrent to immigration into this inland plateau so richly endowed by nature, has been the lack of transportation facilities. But before many more months the great civilizer and foundation of agricultural and commercial advancement—the railroad, will have pushed its way into this beautiful upland of fertile valleys, large, navigable lakes, crystal streams of cold water and forests of the grandest pine trees that ever reared their tops to the blue sky of a cloudless heaven.

There is every indication that at some former period this country was hemmed in by the Cascades and Siskiyou mountain ranges, until some convulsions of nature of volcanic origin rent the mountain barriers on the west and permitted the waters to escape toward the Pacific ocean through the rocky gorge now known as the channel of the Klamath river. Succeeding ages have obliterated many of the land, or rather water-marks, made by the wash of the angry waves of this ancient sea; enough, however, remains to trace its former boundaries. And the deposits of fertilizing material have formed the basis of a soil rich in all the elements of plant growth. The ages of accumulated vegetable mould; the wash of disintegrated volcanic rock, and pumice and deposits of lime and chalk combine to form a variety of soils according to the preponderance of the several materials that are not only productive of a varied class of agricultural products, but are very easily subdued by the plow and respond handsomely to intelligent culture.

The cereals of all kinds are produced in abundance. Oregon flour has fame for superiority wherever introduced. The first prize for wheat awarded at the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893, went to wheat on exhibition from Klamath county.

All the hardier vegetables flourish here and are of a flavor and crispness found in but a few other localities. Potatoes yield bountifully and are never affected with pests or other unsoundness so common elsewhere. Sugar beets grow well and contain enough saccharine matter to justify their culture for sugar making. Apples, pears, plums, prunes, cherries and in some localities peaches and berries are successfully raised. All kinds of grasses do well here, but the main ones used are the natural grasses and alfalfa. Flax is native of this county but the cultivation of tame flax has never been tried. Oregon marshes would furnish a wonderful revenue if prepared for cranberry culture, as the location and general characteristics are ideal for the raising of that berry which has made many a millionaire in the eastern states. On the dry uplands alfalfa, sain foin, sand vetch and other productive forage plants have been successfully cultivated and if more extensively planted would become a valuable source of revenue to the stock raiser. Hops, though not raised for the market, are grown somewhat and never fail to yield abundantly.

January 1, 1905, the government land opened to settlement in Klamath county was 399,191 acres.

The climate is all that can be desired, the temperature ranging from 95 degrees in summer to zero in winter in the plateau section and the average annual precipitation is 19.76 inches. There is none of the hot, dry, enervating weather of the more southern regions and none of the severely cold weather of the east. It is in fact a climate that conduces to the highest development of man and the most perfect development in the animal and vegetable kingdom. Quite the largest percentage of the precipitation occurs from October to May, the snowfall varying greatly, some winters being from three to four feet and others not exceeding six inches. At no time of the year does rain fall in torrents or in very heavy showers, but it is usually a gentle downfall lasting for several hours.

During the summer the wind, or gentle breeze, as it might be more properly called, prevails from the north and during the winter from the south. No cyclone or blizzard was ever known to occur in this region, nor any severe drouth, flood or other unusual climatic occurrence. From the records compiled by the Oregon Weather Bureau for eighteen years are taken the following average laws in Klamath county:

Average mean temperature, 45.6; average maximum temperature, 59.3; average minimum temperature, 31.9; highest temperature on record, 95; lowest plateau temperature, 15; average precipitation, 19.76 inches; average number of days clear each year, 112; average number of days partly cloudy each year, 158; average number of days cloudy, 95; average number of days each year on which one-one hundredth of an inch of precipitation fell, 84.

The county of Klamath is so extensive, the resources and conditions of different sections so varied that a general description of the county, covering all points is impossible. We will endeavor to describe the county by sections, presenting a brief description of each. Our attention will be first directed to agricultural sections which are located in the different valleys. These sections are the valleys of Lost river, Tule lake, Sprague river, Langell's, Swan lake and Poe, the fertile lands bordering Link river, Lower Klamath lake and Wood river valley.

Lost River Valley, as it is generally termed, comprises the territory between Klamath Falls and Lost river as far south as the head of Tule Lake valley. It averages about five miles wide by 20 miles long and by reason of its twenty-mile irrigation system which has been in operation several years, early settlement, great extent and proximity to the county seat is one of the best known and most improved. It produces abundantly of grain, alfalfa, potatoes, etc., there being some 4,000 or 5,000 acres irrigated. It lies so that 50,000 acres of it can be irrigated and at present this is one of the main feeding grounds of the county.

Tule Lake Valley lies from the California line about five miles north and is some 15 miles in length. Its principal town is Merrill and its chief pursuits raising grain, alfalfa and cattle. The soil is sandy and peculiarly adapted to the raising of alfalfa. The principal irrigation system is known as the Little Klamath Irrigation Company—or locally the Adams Canal. The water is taken from the Little Klamath lake by two lines of canals, the length of one being fifteen miles and the other 28 miles. Combined they have a capacity to irrigate 15,000 acres of land. This company claims that its irrigation system is the most complete in the United States.

Poe Valley, which is about four miles wide, begins at Lost River Gap and runs in a south-easterly direction for about ten miles. It is quite well settled and the residents devote their attention to the raising of farm produce and cattle, the latter having good range on the surrounding hills. The Klamath Canal Company's system extends through this valley, and when in operation will cause this to be one of the most fruitful areas in the county.

Langell's Valley is about five miles in width and extends eastward from Bonanza some fourteen miles. It is essentially a valley of stock-growers, owing to its ample range and large areas of natural grass land. It lies quite level and is watered through its entire course by Lost River and its tributaries. Much irrigation is done here in a small way, but it remains for public enterprise to establish canals which will bring out the fullest values of the lands of this valley. The floor of this valley is quite level and is watered throughout its entire course by Lost River and its tributaries.

Sprague River is very extensive, most of it being in the Klamath Reservation and therefore of interest to the homesteader when the reservation is opened for settlement. Its course runs for fifty miles through the county, ranging in width from half a mile to a dozen or more miles. It has a magnificent range for stock adjacent to its whole length and the valley is a veritable wonderland of natural meadows.

Sican Valley is a tributary to Sprague River valley and through its forty-five miles, ranging in width from half a mile to ten miles, the stream meanders in and out of rich meadows and large flats of agricultural lands. It is devoted at present to stock raising by the Indians, but some day will be a great and wealthy stock raising section.

Williamson River Valley extends from the mouth of Williamson river, where it empties into the Upper Klamath lake, for fifty miles to the northeast and with its various tributary valleys forms a large system of fertile agricultural, meadow and natural grass lands, supplemented by excellent range on the surrounding hills and mountains. The valley varies from half a mile to fifteen miles in width and contains the vast Klamath marsh of some 60,000 acres.

Horsefly and Barnes Valleys are in the uplands of the eastern part of the county and are devoted to the raising of cattle, a very extensive range falling under the control of these small but well-located valleys.

Swan Lake Valley lies north of Lost River valley, a range of high hills intervening. It is about six by ten miles in extent and has a lake on the east side which by its overflow produces large areas of grass land. This valley is well watered toward the upper end and is surrounded by an exceedingly large territory of valuable range land and timber. The residents devote their attention to stock raising.

Yonna Valley, which is about twenty miles east of the county seat, is some ten miles long and four miles wide. It is well watered and produces much natural grass on the overflow lands. It is surrounded by good timber and plenty of range for cattle, which is the chief industry, although considerable grain is raised and general farming done. Alkali lake is located in this valley and is one and one-half miles wide by three miles long. This lake is fed by snow and by the numerous large springs flowing from the sides of the mountain. Thus it will be seen that nature has provided irrigation. It is surrounded by plenty of range for cattle and fine, large timber.

Wood River Valley in which is located the town of Fort Klamath, is one of the most beautiful valleys in Oregon. It is noted principally for its fine beef and dairy products. After making a trip to the Wood River country in the summer of 1901, Mr. W. Huse published the following in his paper, the Klamath Republican:

From all we saw we feel ready to maintain that the Wood River country is one of the most favored spots that nature ever smiled upon. And the time will come not long hence when that country will be crowded with people, and Wood River and Big Klamath lake will be celebrated as summer resorts by tourists everywhere.

Klamath River Valley which lies along the north and west side of Klamath river, is from one to five miles in width and extends from Klamath Falls along the river for twelve miles. There is much natural grass land and its inhabitants devote their attention to both stock-raising and diversified farming.

The Odel country has been declared by the editor of the Klamath Republican as the "Darkest Klamath Land." And yet Odel is the largest and remotest school district in the United States. This Odell precinct, a rich belt of country, of fertile valleys and magnificent forests, practically unknown to the remainder of the county, is over 100 miles from Klamath Falls and is gained by trails and circuitous routes. From 10 to 11 days are required for a letter mailed at Odel to reach the county seat. While the vote of Odell precinct is only 17, yet the exact results of an election are invariably delayed for days and even weeks, until Odel can send in her returns. This peculiar precinct lies at the extreme north end of the county on the headwaters of the Des Chutes river, and it is claimed that it was discovered to belong to Klamath county only a few years ago. Charles Graves wrote in the Klamath Republican, February 16, 1905, as follows:

Arriving here on the Des Chutes a few years ago I was astonished to find such a beautiful river and such fine forests of yellow pine mixed with sugar pine on the higher ridges. This river has many rapids and with its high rock walls, dam building is easy and inexpensive. The continuous descent gives opportunity for as good water power here as there is in the world. Walker Basin, the principal valley, is sixty miles long and averages from six to twelve miles in width. Much of this basin is good agricultural land, and where tried produces timothy and red clover to perfection; also wheat, barley, rye, oats and vetch, yielding an exceptionally good crop.

Many eastern people have timber claims here and no doubt will now take agricultural land as it has been restored to entry. This part of Klamath county has only recently been discovered. Two years ago the assessor found it and pounced down on two or three settlers who had discovered the region and located here hoping to elude him. The sheriff also discovered it about six months ago. Odell had a school district containing two schools. The teachers say that the county school superintendent has so far been unable to find or even locate the district. This, however, is not to be wondered at. The district embraces 1,554 square miles. January 1, 1902, the district contained $4,095 worth of taxable property; March 1, 1904, there was nearly $350,000, and by March 1, this year it will reach, or even exceed a half million dollars in value. There is one postoffice in the district—Odell. It receives mail twice a week from Rosland. A letter to reach Klamath Falls must go north to Rosland, thence southeast to Silver Lake, thence to Lakeview, and thence west 110 miles to the county seat town, a total distance of 295 miles which requires eight to eleven days for a letter to reach its destination. This is rather inconvenient for settlers and retards the development of this portion of the county. Strangers will not settle where the mail facilities are so poor. A gauging station has been established at Odell by the United States Reclamation Service.

Aside from its splendid farming and stock-raising facilities Klamath county contains the finest timber belt in interior Oregon. It is conservatively estimated that there are at least 15,000,000,000 feet of pine now standing awaiting the logger, the mill and transportation facilities to carry it into the outer world where it is so badly needed. This timber, consisting of both yellow and white pine, is of superior quality. Ten years ago Charles H. Pierce, of Seattle, wrote as follows concerning Klamath county timber:

The principal varieties of timber for commercial value in Klamath county are sugar pine, yellow pine, red fir, yellow fir, red cedar, larch and white pine. The area covered by sugar pine in any appreciable quantity is very small, that timber being confined almost alone in Klamath county to the Jenny creek plateau, which extends from Lake of the Woods south to the California line, and from the summit of the Cascades eastward to the Klamath river. The sugar pine of Klamath county is apparently of as good quality as any on the coast, and of very healthy, clean growth.

Notwithstanding the small area to which the growth of sugar pine is confined I should estimate the total stumpage of that timber in Klamath county and that small strip in Jackson county which lies on the eastern slope of the Cascades at not less than 400,000,000 feet:

Yellow pine largely predominates in quantity over any other timber in the county, and it is probable that three-fourths of all timber in the county is yellow pine of some variety, for I class the so-called "bull pine" as a species of yellow pine, with, however, a thicker sap and of smaller and younger growth than the finer body of the true yellow pine, which also grows best on the Jenny Creek plateau, but is found in more or less quantity all over the county. Pacific coast yellow pine is a much better wood than the best yellow pine of the Southern states, being softer, closer grained, and freer from pitchy substance.

Red and yellow fir are fairly abundant in Klamath county and in some spots high up in the mountains predominate over all other timber, notably in the Dead Indian region, where a large portion of a body of fir ranks with the best fir on Puget sound in quality and yield per acre. As a general thing the fir which grows among the pines of Southern Oregon is not of so good quality as the fir which abounds in the moister climates of Northern Oregon and the Puget sound region of Washington. There is sufficient good fir in Klamath to round out the other and more valuable timber and to enable the mills to fill general and mixed orders for heavy and long framing sticks and structural timbers to which pine is not well adapted.

The red cedar of the Cascade range in Southern Oregon is not of much value, due to the peculiarly hot, dry summer seasons, which climate, however, is just adapted to the superior growth of sugar and yellow pines. The Klamath red cedar will answer very well for shingles and fence posts, but the dry rot which enters nearly every tree, even in the grand Jenny Creek section, renders this cedar of little value for timber. The larch and white pines of the Klamath slope grow together in one place only so far as the writer knows, high up on the summit plateau of the Cascades, but readily accessible to the river or to the Upper Klamath lake. The quality of both woods is fine, but the quantity is rather limited, especially the white pine, of which there is, all told, less than 25,000,000 feet scattered among the other timber.

Larch has been used and highly commended as a furniture and finish wood by firms in Portland and Oregon City. Of larch there is not probably to exceed 250,000,000 feet in Klamath county, confined within the radius of six miles of the natural point for operations, in places the heaviest stand of timber in all Southern Oregon, and equal to almost everything on the coast. In general figures even, it would be very difficult for the best timberman in Oregon to even approximate the amount of saw timber tributary to the Klamath lakes and the upper end of the Klamath river. But I have little hesitation in saying that I think when sawed, it will aggregate more than 5,000,000,000 of feet.

I have estimates on nearly every 40 of timber on the Jenny creek plateau, including everything north as far as Lake of the Woods, made by competent cruisers, and on that great plateau alone I am prepared to state emphatically that there is three billion feet of merchantable pine, yellow pine, fir, larch and white pine. The balance of the county and that portion of Jackson county which drains toward the Upper Klamath lake must surely contain as much more timber, though the average yield per acre for the balance of the county is much less than for the Jenny creek plateau, and the timber surrounding the lakes is shorter bodied and of smaller growth. Assuming that five billion feet of merchantable timber now stands tributary to the lakes and upper portion of the river, what does it mean? It probably means that lumber of such quality, when worked up, including the dressing of the same, yield on an average $12 per M. at the mills, assuming that the value of Klamath's timber will enhance much before it is half cut off, and that of this $12 about $8 for every thousand feet manufactured will come to and be spent in Klamath county in some form or other, or counting it as a basis of exchange. This means $40,000,000 certain revenue for Klamath county at some time in her history, almost incredible figures, but which will, I firmly believe be borne out by the facts.

For stock raising Klamath county is eminently fitted. Buyers from all parts of the coast come here and purchase cattle. The number of communities more or less isolated from the great commercial markets of the nation have never had a greater factor in producing prosperity and acquiring a reputation for industrial success than the dairying industry. When hay and other agricultural products would not pay to ship they were fed to cows and the products—butter and cheese—yielded a profit that was distributed throughout the entire community, creating a prosperity that always comes from frequent payments of honestly earned cash, so this county, should anything occur to cause an overplus of hay, can do likewise with every factor to secure a successful competency.

The fishing grounds of Klamath county are extensive and embrace a large variety of game fish than any similar resort on the coast. In the Upper Klamath lake and Link river seven varieties of the steelhead trout have been caught, ranging in weight from a few ounces to sixteen pounds which raise to the fly readily during the summer months, take the spoon in the spring and fall and the minnow at all seasons of the year. The famous Dolly Varden trout are found in Cherry and Sun creeks, Seven mile creek and other streams which flow into the Upper Klamath lake. In Lost river, which flows within ten miles of Klamath Falls, there is an annual spring run of mullet of such an extent that a cannery has been established at the point of vantage. In Klamath river which flows from Klamath Falls to the Pacific ocean, the fall fishing for salmon, salmon trout and silver side trout is exceptionally fine. The most noted of all the fishing streams are Spring creek and Williamson river, celebrated for their exceptionally gamey rainbow trout weighing from a half to fourteen pounds, and Pelican Bay which teems with lake trout.

Deer are plentiful along the summit plateau of the Cascade range and spurs east of the lakes, and bear and elk are occasionally found. In the way of lesser game may be mentioned pheasants, grouse, sage-hens, prairie chicken and rabbits, while the great marshes of the lakes abound in swans, pelicans, ducks and geese. Snipe shooting about the lakes has long been a favorite sport with the sportsmen of Klamath Falls.

It is now ours to describe in a humble way some of the wonders of Klamath county—or rather attempt a description—for some of them are indescribable. These will include its rivers, lakes, springs and last, but not least, its famous "berry patch." The magazines and newspapers of the country have told of the beautiful scenery of Klamath county. Crater Lake, one of the most famous productions of nature, is here, and comprises a portion of a panorama of grandeur which has been converted into a national park and to which thousands come annually to visit.

Upper Klamath lake is forty miles long with an average of ten miles in width and is navigable its entire length and breadth. It is fed by two large rivers and numerous smaller streams, and a number of these are navigable for smaller craft, into which the man with rod and gun may penetrate and enjoy unexcelled sport. This lake is connected with Lake Ewauna by Link river. The two lakes are one mile apart, and the river is a gradual fall, the water boiling over the rocks with a roar. At the foot of this stream is the town of Klamath Falls, the capital of the county. From Lake Ewauna flows the Klamath river into the Lower Klamath lake, another vast body of water lying in Oregon and California, which is, also, navigable. Indeed, Lake Ewauna, Klamath river and Lower Klamath lake are all used at present for navigation purposes with Klamath Falls the market for the products of the country adjoining them. It has been a perplexing question where Klamath river begins. In reality its source is Lake Ewauna and the head of the river is at Baldwin's Island. The following story is given as a tradition among the Cahroe Indians:

The Coyote went at length on his tour of inspection to the country of the Klamath river and found the people there in the most destitute condition. The river had had an abundance of salmon, but three Skookums at the mouth of the stream had constructed a dam so that they might get all the fish, and thus prevented the ascent of the customary food supply. By this selfishness of the Skookums he was much incensed and vowed that before many days so much fish should come up the river as to give all the men, women and children, and even the dogs, all the food they could eat.

He went to the mouth of the river and found the house of the Skookums, and entering as a homeless coyote began his observations. Although he was hungry and whined for some of the fine fish that the Skookums had, he was not noticed, and his fast was unbroken, even with the smell of delicious salmon in his nostrils. He saw, however, where the Shookums kept their key for the gate of the dam, and the next morning, when one of the three women started down to open the trap and let out a fish for herself, he darted out of the lodge and running between her feet succeeded in tripping her, so that she fell and threw the key out of her hand. Seizing this instantly the Coyote went to the dam and opened the gate, letting the swarming salmon pass through, and up to the country of the Cahroes. He then broke down the dam and since that time the fish have gone every year to the upper stream.

One of the most important and historic streams in the state of Oregon is Lost River. Some of the best ranches in Klamath county now lie along this stream, though in the early days it was the battle ground of the Indians. It was here that more immigrants were slain than at any other point in the country, and here it was that Ben Wright and his famous twenty-three wreaked vengeance upon the savages by attacking a whole band and killing and scalping the men, women and children. The river runs through a level plain, "losing" and "finding" itself alternately. It rises as a vast spring and after flowing a long distance it disappears in the sands, but emerges again within a short distance and one may watch its course and easily determine that it is the same stream. Hence the name Lost River. Along its banks the soil is fertile, and where the Indian once laid in wait for the weary, travel-stained immigrant who sought the water of this stream, after crossing the plains, for himself and team, and to pass a few days in this, at that time the great oasis in the Oregon desert, now well-to-do and prosperous farmers and stockmen dwell in peace and comfort, and the latch-string of their homes is always out to the weary traveler.

Lost River is one hundred miles long, and averages eighty feet in width. Through the lava beds, noted as the stronghold of Captain Jack and his Modoc confederates, the stream has a subterranean channel. The ice caves which refreshed the Indian warriors of 1873 add to their stores by seepage from this famous stream. In the stirring times of war the nearby thunder of rushing waters mingled with the Modoc tongue in a large cavern occupied by the savages for refuge and council. In this chamber Captain Jack and his band, sipping from chips of ice and improvising seats from the bones of prehistoric animals, would plan to frustrate the federal soldiers.

Link is really the upper course of the Klamath river, and is a stream of considerable volume. Upon leaving Upper Klamath Lake the river plunges over a succession of rapids, descending about one hundred feet in the course of two miles, and providing a fine water power. At Klamath Falls it broadens out, forming a lakelet, and then flows placidly through the level plains until joined by the stream from Lower Klamath lake. Here it begins its turbulent descent through the grand and picturesque gorge of the Klamath. It has an average width of three hundred feet. In a distance of a trifle over a mile it has a fall of between sixty and seventy feet, thus providing power sufficient to turn the wheels of all the machinery that could be located along its banks. Geographers have made the mistake of saying that Link river connects Upper and Lower Klamath lakes. This is erroneous, Lower Klamath lake being a dozen miles from the place where Link river terminates. It connects Upper Klamath and Ewauna lakes. A few times within the memory of white men Link river has been dry, not from the usual causes, but owing to heavy winds driving its waters back to their source. On each occasion this phenomenon has been preceded for a number of days by strong south winds.

Sprague, which flows into Williamson river, a few miles from its mouth, rises in the eastern portion of the county. With its tributaries it forms an immense valley nearly one hundred miles long. This section of the country is devoted almost exclusively to the industry of stock-raising, the range grasses and natural meadows being practically inexhaustible.

Williamson river is a wide and beautiful stream fringed by trees on both banks. It flows from the northern part of the county and debouches into Upper Klamath lake. It is equal to its tributary, Spring Creek, as a fishing stream, but it is not so clear and cold, the temperature of Spring Creek being 38 degrees the year round. The latter stream is about six miles east of the Klamath Agency, and its surroundings are as peaceful and glorious as the sylvan dells and shaded retreats of the Rhine. It derives its name from the many springs which may be seen bubbling up out of its white, sandy bottom. In many places in the bed of Spring Creek are patches of water balls of a greenish brown hue, filled with a gelatinous liquid. They present an interesting picture.

The waters of Wood river are deep, clear as crystal and cold as ice. The streams flowing into the northern end of Upper Klamath lake are Wood river, with its tributaries, Fort, Crooked, Cherry, Anna and Sevenmile Creeks.

Rogue river rises just within the boundaries of Klamath county and the famous Des Chutes heads in the northern end. The principal lakes of the county are Upper and Lower Klamath, Tule, Lake of the Woods and Crater. Aside from these there are Davis, Odell, Crescent, Summit, Fish, Aspen, Wocus, Long, Round, Buck, Two-Mile, Four-Mile and Diamond.

Of these lakes the one that looms highest on the horizon of natural scenery is Crater which, with its surroundings, presents a most magnificent and marvellous spectacle. The geology and petrography of Crater Lake National Park have been described by Joseph Silas Diller and Horace Bushnell Patton, and their work published by the government in 1902. From their report we take the following excerpts:

Twenty years ago Crater Lake was unknown to the general public, but since then a knowledge of its remarkable features has been spread abroad through the press, and Congress recognized its worth as an educational feature and made it a national park by the act approved May 22, 1902.

As defined by the bill the park is "bounded north by the parallel forty-three degrees four minutes north latitude, south by forty-two degrees forty-eight minutes north latitude, east by the meridian one hundred and twenty-two degrees west longitude, and west by the meridian one hundred and twenty-two degrees sixteen minutes west longitude, having an area of two hundred and forty-nine square miles."

A great impetus to the spread of information concerning Crater Lake was given by Mazamas of Portland, Oregon, who held a meeting at the lake in August, 1896, which attracted many visitors. The principal features in the history of the lake has previously been made out, and the Mazamas, recognizing the fact that the great peak which was nearly destroyed in preparing the pit for the lake had no name, gave it the name of their own society. Upon the rim of the lake are a number of small peaks, each having its own designation. The term Mount Mazama refers to the whole rim encircling the lake. It is but a mere remnant of the once lofty peak, the real Mount Mazama, which rose far into the region of eternal snow. To get a basis for reconstructing the original Mount Mazama it is necessary to study in detail the structure and composition of its foundation, now so attractively displayed in the encircling cliffs of Crater Lake. * * * The wrecking of Mount Mazama was the crowning event in the volcanic history of the Cascade Range, and resulted from a movement similar to that just noted in Mount Thielsen but vastly greater in its size and consequences. This volcanic activity culminated in the development of a great pit or caldera, which for grandeur and beauty rivals anything of its kind in the world.

The rim encircling Crater Lake, when seen from a distance from any side, appears as a broad cluster of gently sloping peaks rising about 1,000 feet above the general crest of the range on which they stand. A good view is obtained from the road along Anna creek, where the southern portion of the rim appears as shown on Pl. III, B. Here Castle Crest and Vidae Peak are the most prominent features, with the canyon of Anna Creek in the foreground. The topographic prominence of Mount Mazama can be more fully realized when it is considered that it is close to the head of Rogue, Klamath and Umpqua rivers. These are the only large streams breaking through the mountains to the sea between the Columbia and the Sacramento, and their watershed might be expected to be the principal peak of the Cascade range. To one arriving by the road at the crest of the rim, the lake in all its majestic beauty suddenly appears upon the scene, and is profoundly impressive. The eye beholds twenty miles of unbroken cliffs, the remnant of Mount Mazama, ranging from over 500 to nearly 2,000 feet in height, encircling a deep, blue sheet of placid water in which the mirrored walls vie with the original slopes in brilliancy and greatly enhance the depth of the prospect. The lake is about  $4\frac{1}{4}$  miles wide and  $6\frac{1}{4}$  miles long, with an area of nearly  $20\frac{1}{2}$  square miles.

From the wooded slope a short distance within the rim at Victor Rock, an excellent general view of the lake may be obtained. The first point to catch the eye is Wizard Island, lying nearly two miles away, near the western margin of the lake. Its irregular western edge and the steep but symmetrical truncated cone in the eastern portion are very suggestive of volcanic origin. We cannot, however, indulge our first impulse to go at once to the island, for the various features of the rim are of greater importance in unraveling the earlier stages of its geological history.

On the left is the western border of the lake, with the Watchman, Glacier Peak, and Devil's Backbone opposite Wizard Island, and L'ao Rock beyond. * * * * * On the right is the southern border of the lake. Castle Crest, Kerr Notch, Scott Peak, Sentinel Rock and Cloud Cap appear in the distance along the rim. The boldest part of the southern rim is cut off from this view of Castle Crest. * * * There are three types of lavas in Mount Mazama—andesites, dacites and basalts. The immediate rim of the lake is made up wholly of andesites and dacites, chiefly the former; the basalts are limited to the outer slope. They came from the smaller vents around the base of the larger cone.

The theory of magmatic differentiation, so ably advocated by Professor Iddings and others in this country to explain in differences lavas erupted from the same volcanic center, accords well with the course of events in Mount Mazama. Its eruptions began with and long continued to be composed of lava having intermediate composition. This lava was followed first by less siliceous lava, the basalt from a number of small vents on the flanks of the great volcano, and finally by the dacites, which closed the petrographic cycle. It is possible that the basalts and dacites may have been in part contemporaneous, but the last eruption from the great mountain was of dacite. Then came the great engulfment, and a new petrographic cycle began with the andesite of Wizard Island.

With the above scientific and reliable description of Crater Lake as an introduction let us continue our story of this marvelous and picturesque sample of nature's handicraft along less scientific yet, possibly, more attractive lines. In 1902 Governor Geer wrote:

"The crater which holds the lake, including the 2,000 feet of walls above it, would easily hold Mount Hood as it stands today. In fact if Mount Hood were inverted and dropped into Crater lake it would make a very happy geological fit."

In 1881 there was published at Lakeview a paper called the State Line Herald. A writer in that journal thus describes a "Trip to Crater Lake.":

The only means we have of determining the grandeur or magnitude of an object is by comparison, using some other as a standard. But where we can find no suitable standard for comparison, the mind is for a time absorbed with contemplation, until by degrees the reality is unfolded, and in the case under consideration, the greatness of the scene dawns upon the beholder and the traveler is made to feel that he is gazing upon one of the great natural wonders of the world. For a time our little party stood in silence, almost dazed in contemplating the silent, solemn grandeur before us.

Here, ages ago were enacted some of those terrible upheavals, which within a day raise up or tear down mountains. Evidences of volcanic action are scattered and piled all around us, and evidently this mammoth excavation has at some time been the crater of an active volcano, now extinct. Just imagine this a boiling cauldron, eight by fifteen miles in extent, and of an unknown depth, with its liquid fire shooting tongues of flame toward the sky, blackening and charring the walls of its rocky prison from base to summit. The tracks of flame are clearly visible and will remain so for all time. The walls are composed of conglomerate masses of rock all showing more or less the unmistakable influence of fire. These walls, or rather this wall, for it encircles it completely without a break, varies from 1,500 to 3,000 feet in perpendicular height above the surface of the lake. In places the wall is nearly perpendicular, and a rock dropped from the highest points finds no obstacle in the way for at least one thousand feet, and with three bounds strikes the water three thousand feet below. The writer tried the experiment. Lying flat, his face beyond the brink, he dropped a stone from his hand and as he watched it rapidly sink down, down, down, was taken with an almost irresistible impulse to follow. The sensation was too unpleasant for repetition.

The character of the scene may be better understood by the reader who is conversant with high mountains, if he will imagine a lofty peak 14,000 or 15,000 feet high, with 5,000 or 6,000 feet of the top taken off, and the inside hollowed out to the dimensions given of Crater lake. Toward the west side is an island 1,500 feet high, having a hollowed place on the top which is usually filled with snow. This mountain is evidently the last chimney of the old volcano, which judging from the character of the rocks composing it and the timber occupying its sides, has slept for ages and to all appearances will sleep on to the end of time. There is but one place where it is possible to make the descent to the water, and there is great caution required to avoid an accident. At this point a track or causeway has been worn through the cliff by the rolling of rocks, which have ground and battered down these natural battlements and left in their stead rock dust and ashes into which the traveler sinks ankle deep as he slowly winds his way downward. This causeway is about 100 feet wide, and in places has walls from two to four hundred feet high. It is perfectly straight and about 1,500 feet in perpendicular height above the water, the angle inclination varying from twenty to forty-five degrees from the perpendicular. We amused ourselves for a time rolling rocks down this pathway, and were astonished at the velocity they obtained. Huge boulders weighing a ton would bound along with accelerated speed until their great velocity would cause them to spring 100 feet in the air, and strike near the bottom; after flying through space for two hundred yards when, with a final spring they would plunge beneath the waves two hundred yards from shore. By placing the ear to the edge of the cliff the sound of the falling boulders could be heard as they bounded from rock to rock for some time after they had disappeared below the surface.

Some time before our first visit to this mystic spot a party had been there and after great difficulty had lowered a skiff to the water, and with sounding line and lead had embarked upon the lake. They turned their course toward the cone-shaped island before described, and about two miles distant. At different points they played out all their line; about 600 feet and touched no bottom. They landed upon the island and with difficulty climbed to the summit of the cone. There is no visible inlet or outlet to the lake, but currents are distinctly traceable upon its surface, showing that the waters have ingress to and egress from this giant basin. This theory is confirmed by the fact that Anna Creek, which flows into Klamath lake from the north, emerges in a body from the side of this mountain and about one and one-half miles from the summit, and coming from the immediate direction of this lake. Rogue River, also, though its course lies to the west and finds its way directly to the ocean, has its source in Crater lake. It, as does Anna creek, flows in a body from the side of the mountain and about two miles from the summit.

Crater Lake

Threshing Scene in Klamath Valley

While investigating the curiosities to be found and wonders to be seen about the banks of the lake, a storm of wind and snow came upon us. None except those who have been on high mountains under like circumstances can easily imagine the effect of a snow storm among the clouds. Here, 9,000 feet above the ocean, we found ourselves suddenly enveloped in clouds, which seemed in a body to roll along on the surface of the mountain, while we, thus surrounded, were almost suffocated by the blinding, whirling flakes as they were deposited among the rocks and peaks about us. Within five minutes the waters of the lake were hidden from our view, and our party were forced to seek the shelter of trees near at hand.

The writer had a curiosity to descend to the water and view the appearance of Crater Lake in a snow storm. No one else seemed inclined to attempt the descent under the circumstances, so providing ourselves with a staff we started alone. The trip down was made in a reasonably short time, and standing there we looked about upon the surging billows and then around at the towering walls that hedged us in. It is difficult to give an idea of the effect upon one's nerves. There we stood, apparently in the bowels of the earth, the clouds formed a complete covering and seemed to rest on the top of the mighty wall. Those of the party at the summit, though they declined to accompany us, stood upon the bank, though they could not be seen from the bottom. The wind had lashed the lake into fury and foam, and the waves were running four and five feet high and beating the shores as if in a maddened effort to break their prison walls and give freedom for the lake. The old skiff lay upon a rocky shelf, and that we might claim a solitary credit we pushed it into the water and in a minute more were afloat upon the stormy waves. We did not venture far, however, and breathed freely when again on terra firma.

From this point a splendid view of the towering cliffs could be had, and in that lonely spot alone we, in imagination, saw re-enacted the terrible convulsions of nature that once held headquarters near and transformed the country for hundreds of miles in extent. The walls seem at that time to have been in a semi-molten state when old Vulcan with the power alone vouchsafed to him, belched forth the missiles of war, fire and lava, throwing boulders of tons in weight with such force as to imbed them in the plastic wall where they still cling, an evidence of volcanic power. Here the maddened flames played, and in liquid flashes darted their fiery tongues heavenward. Here the awful thunders belched forth terror to the inhabitants of the surrounding country, and the frightened Indian crouched in fear beneath the shelter of neighboring mountains, or fled before the mighty avalanche of burning lava that poured down from the devil-possession heights. Here, alone in this loneliest of spots, with the waves fire-begrimed and time-scarred battlements of nature, dashing madly against the shore, surrounded by this the clouds resting upon its summits, and apparently shutting us in from all the world alone; where the seething fires of hell seem once to have held high carnival and, cancer-like, to have devoured a mighty mountain, we were seized with a feeling that in this awe-inspiring solitude some of the minions of Beelzebub might still lurk to punish the presumption of sinful man who should dare to invade even this deserted sanctum of his Satanic Majesty.

The Indians of this section of the country have a tradition that this lake is the abode of evil spirits, and that to him who had the hardihood even to look into its silent depths, the penalty of death will surely be meted out. Hence they do not come near it, and have warned the whites of the danger of incurring the displeasure of these spirits.

The water of Crater Lake is nearly pure, very cold and incomparably clear. Objects are seen at a great depth, but no one has yet succeeded in ascertaining how deep the waters are. Our curiosity was soon satisfied and, in dread of the task ahead, we commenced the toilsome ascent. At every step one sinks ankle deep in the loose deposits of ashes and pulverized pumice and the journey becomes tedious and tiresome. To avoid excessive fatigue we turned from the causeway and attempted to clamber up among the rocks, where it seemed we might find firm footing; but we came near being the victim of an accident which would have thrown another young widow upon the world. With great difficulty we regained the causeway and after an hour of laborious climbing rejoined the party that was awaiting our return.

The clouds had passed away and old Sol again illuminated the deep recesses of these rugged mountains, and gave a more cheerful prospect for our investigation. We climbed to the summit of the highest peak, and from that point saw one of the most interesting and extensive landscapes it has been our pleasure to behold.

The following short description of Crater Lake is from the pen of W. S. Parrott, written in 1892. Mr. Parrott is an eminent artist and painted a picture of the lake which he visited about that time:

What a grand spectacle in mid-winter when swirls of frost driven by Arctic storms howl through the splintered crags of Castle Mountain and sigh among the sturdy hemlocks—a mass of knots and twists—that hang in the almost sunless caverns of perpetual winter! This hardy specimen of the vegetable kingdom is almost immortal, for it will grow on the crests of toppling pinnacles which seem held intact only by the network of roots which fetter it to its drossy environment. Again it may be seen at the base of some dizzy height from which it has been hurled hundreds of feet through the open air, but still clutching some of its native soil in its cancer-like grasp, continues to grow on as though transplanted, and year after year comes forth from a grave of ten months' snow as fresh and green as the arbor vitæ of our gardens.

Now wander back in fancy to the ancient crater Lake mountain and for a moment revel in the handiwork of the furies as they paint the stormy panorama through unreckoned ages of chaos, written only in the hieroglyphics of crumbling walls and sunken mountains. But with a Dante's ambition to transcend, in search of a terror inferno, may we through burning firmament descend to the war of primitive nature where tableaux of vanishing recreation linger for a moment, then vanish in the fierce maelstrom of unchained elements; at last the furies, their work complete, join hands in their wrath and the troubled earth rises to mid-heavens, a Plutonic throne of fire to light the surrounding world—but, alas! a temple of time, it fell back with a crash that shook a continent, to slumber forever 'neath the lake ultramarine.

Nature's wreck and man's glory, may you on canvas and in poet's pen forever live!

The most picturesque of all the larger lakes of Oregon may be said to be Upper Klamath. Theoretically, this lake, with the Klamath marsh, the plains in the vicinity of Klamath Falls, and the basins of Lower Klamath and Rhett lakes, were all formerly submerged under a single sheet of water of great size. This prehistoric lake, it is supposed, was drained off at the period when the gorge of Klamath river had been cut down below its level. Comparatively speaking the present lakes are only pools of water left in the deepest parts of its bed.

At the base of the Cascade Range lies Upper Klamath lake. Over 4,000 feet above sea level is its elevation; its area is about 130 square miles. To our knowledge its depth has never been ascertained. It is hemmed in by magnificent, imposing mountains. On the west rise the densely wooded slopes of the Cascades, some of whose loftiest peaks are mantled with perpetual snow. To the east are bare, rocky acclivities, of no slight elevation. Especially fine is the view from the hills at the south end of this lake. To the northward sleeps the lake, framed in mountain peaks, while far to the southward the summit of Shasta, overtopping all intervening ridges, forms the most prominent features of the landscape.

Of irregular outline are the shores of Upper Klamath lake; they are, mainly, steep and rocky, and a few small islands dot the surface. Several large streams flow into the northern part, and at the southern end the waters discharge through Link river. This is the only large lake in Oregon that overflows.

Lower, or Little Klamath lake, is of small size and only a portion of it (some nine miles) lies in Oregon. It is navigable and steamers ply its waters from Klamath Falls to various points on the lake.

Rhett, or Tule lake is a fair-sized body of water, but properly it belongs to California, only about four square miles of its area lying within the boundaries of Oregon. Rhett, Tule or Wright lake as it is variously called, is a body of water known to fame. On its southern shore lie the celebrated Modoc lava beds.

Lake of the Woods, some five miles in length, surrounded by dense forests and green meadows, is situated about ten miles west of Pelican Bay, of Upper Klamath lake. It is near the western boundary of the county. It has a beautiful pebbly shore, and is among the handsomest of lakes.

For over thirty years Klamath Falls (Linkville) has stood on the shore of a little lake now known as Ewauna. Until lately it had no name, and was referred to locally as simply "the lake." The name Ewauna, according to Captain O. C. Applegate, was conferred upon it by the Indians, and signifies "elbow."

South of Lake of the Woods five comparatively small lakes, in the midst of a vast field of lava, lie at a great altitude, surrounded by a dozen lofty peaks, constituting what was known in earlier days as the "Snowy Cluster."

There is in the immediate vicinity of Klamath Falls a "nest" of hot springs. Some of them contain medicinal properties; some of them do not. They vary in temperature, one of them running exceedingly high, so high in fact that it has been named the "Devil's Tea Kettle." Throughout eastern Oregon some of these springs are used by ranchers and butchers for the purpose of scalding hogs; in earlier days they were utilized by Indians for boiling their meats. But the "Devil's Tea Kettle" is too hot for all practical purposes.

Near this place, also, is the famous hot earth, or solfatara, a spot—an acre or so in extent—situated on a hillside, at least 150 feet above the big hot spring, or "Devil's Tea Kettle." By boring down seven feet into this hot earth the temperature was ascertained to be 210 degrees. It is claimed that this hot earth, when applied to the parts affected with lumbago, acts like magic. To relieve pain in cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica and paralysis, this treatment is said to be equally efficient.

Of Klamath county's big berry patch the Morning Oregonian of November, 1900, published the following account:

Along the side of Crater Lake and Pelican Bay, in Klamath county, there is a great wonder which is visited by thousands of people annually, that is seldom mentioned and but little known outside of southern Oregon. The great huckleberry patch of Oregon is situated 75 miles from Klamath Falls, in a northerly direction, and eight miles from the famous Crater Lake. At least 3,000 people visited the place this year, and from 3,000 to 5,000 people journey thither every year. They do not visit it as sightseers, but strictly with a business motive.

In earlier times it was the home of the bear and the great storehouse of the Indian. Here the different tribes met on friendly terms and picked the berries and dried them for winter food. Now the bear have almost entirely disappeared and the red man and the white man meet on equal terms and pick this fruit from nature's own orchard.

This remarkable huckleberry patch covers an area of land 20 miles long and from four to five miles wide. The bushes average from three to five feet in height, and are literally loaded with the fruit every year. A failure of the crop has never been known. The "patch" lies along the summit of Huckelberry mountain, a peak of the Cascades, at an altitude of 7,000 feet. The berries are blue-black in color, about the size of a tame cherry and are of delicious flavor. Besides the Indians and Whites of southern Oregon, the inhabitants of northern California and western Idaho flock to this place every year. The berries are picked and canned, or dried on the ground, and taken home ready to be stored for winter's use. In early days the Indians dried them exclusively, but now they have learned the white man's ways.

During the huckleberry season the mountain resembles a city. From 3,000 to 4,000 people are camped about the place, and the numerous camp fires send up their smoke by day, and shoot farther their light by night and the mountain is made merry for twenty miles by the shouting of children and song and merry making. The berries begin to ripen in August and picking continues until snow flies, generally the latter part of November. One person usually picks five or six gallons a day, which when sold bring $1 a gallon in the town. Most of the berries, however, are put up by private families for home consumption. The berries here picked and saved annually run up into the hundreds of thousands of gallons.

Visits to this section are marked by both pleasure and profit. Every kind of amusement is carried on. There are music, dances, Sunday schools and preaching. Besides berry picking there are other features of attraction. Although the bear is practically driven from this, his desirable home, a number are still killed every season while stealing in to make a meal from the luscious berries. Deer are plentiful and hundreds of them are killed annually. Fishing is good in all the lakes and mountain streams, and the place is an ideal spot for the romantic pleasure seeker as well as families who desire to replenish the larder for winter.

We cannot more appropriately close this descriptive chapter of Klamath county than with a short quotation from J. W. Howerton, who published the following in the "Farm and Irrigation Age:"

"This great county, with its healthful climate, its vast area of irrigable land, its numerous beautiful lakes and rivers, so happily situated to be of the greatest service to man, the mountain reservoirs, the great extent of mountain grazing lands, the great herds of horses, mules, cattle and sheep, its marshes, with an abundance of natural hay, the beautiful alfalfa meadows, its enormous body of choicest timber, the adaptability to all staple crops of its fertile valleys, the cheapness of land and the possibilities of irrigation, invite to its shores all good people less favorably situated, to assist in developing these wonderful resources and to secure a happy home."

CHAPTER VIII

POLITICAL.

Since its organization Klamath county has made few mistakes in the selection of men to transact the county's business. Only once in her political history, from 1882 to 1905, has a county official betrayed the confidence of the people who placed him in office. Up to a few years since the county was sparsely settled and those who were candidates for office were known personally to nearly all the voters in the county. Thus the people have been enabled to select honest, capable and conservative officials with but very rare exceptions.

Prior to the formation of Lake county, in 1874, the territory which now comprises Lake and Klamath counties was a part of Jackson county. At that period, aside from the soldiers at Fort Klamath, there were few settlers in southern Oregon east of the Cascade mountains. What few there were, however, occasionally took part in the political matters of Jackson county. The inconveniences this interest in matters political occasioned is illustrated by an event which occurred in 1866. O. A. Stearns was then a soldier at Fort Klamath, and was selected as a delegate representing that part of the county east of the mountains in the county convention held at Jacksonville. He was granted a twenty days' furlough in which to perform this service. For the trip he was denied the use of any of the horses in the government service and was compelled to accept the proffer of a decrepit, feeble pony on which he determined to make the start at least. After wading through snow, mud and slush for nine days, the destination was reached, and Mr. Stearns was on time to participate in the deliberations of the convention.

He left the pony on the eastern slope of the mountains after about half the trip had been accomplished. Here he fell in with a party who offered the use of an unbroken mule to ride, which offer was accepted. He made the return trip on a mule that belonged to the government and which he had been requested to conduct to the fort. But for all its utility to him, he says, he would not have disturbed the long-eared animal in its Rogue River lodging. He won his way to the fort two days before the expiration of his furlough, and expressed himself as glad that he did not have to repeat this experience.

When Lake county was formed, in 1874, conditions were materially improved, but in 1882 the Klamath country was granted a county government of its own, with the seat of government at the little town of Linkville.

When the county machinery was put in motion at the initial meeting of the commissioners' court, November 6, 1882, the following were the officials who took the oath and served as the first officers of Klamath county: W. S. Moore, county judge; Stephen Stukel, commissioner; O. T. Brown, commissioner; W. C. Hale, clerk; Charles Putnam, sheriff; Evan R. Reames, treasurer; S. C. Sumner, coroner. With the exception of Treasurer Reames these gentlemen were all Republicans and were appointed by Governor Moody.

It was not until a month later, December 6, 1882, that a school superintendent was chosen. He was selected by the county court and his salary was placed at $100 a year. C. H. Dyar, a Republican, was the one appointed to this position. J. W. Hamaker's bond as county surveyor was approved at this meeting of December 6th. J. H. Clark, Republican, was the first assessor. June 6, 1883, he resigned and W. C. Clark was appointed to succeed him by the court.

Klamath county's first election occurred June 1, 1884. At that time there were six voting precincts. The precincts and judges of election of this first political contest were as follows:

Plevna precinct—E. Riggs, John Connolly, C. H. Withrow.

Linkville—John F. Miller, D. J. Ferree, J. L. Hanks.

Lost River—I. D. Applegate, G. B. Van Riper, Ira Chandler.

Tule Lake—R. Hutchinson, D. Van Brimmer, E. Whitney.

Sprague River—William Robinson, James Barnes, M. Obenchain.

Wood River—George Loosely, George Nully, Sr., W. J. Tuhoey.

The following were the officials elected: G. W. Smith, Dem., county judge; Mat Obenchain, Rep., commissioner; R. Hutchinson, Dem., commissioner; W. C. Hale, Rep., clerk; Charles Putnam, Rep., sheriff; J. O. Allen, Rep., surveyor; Evan R. Reames, Dem. treasurer; M. D. Childers Dem., assessor; C. R. De Lap, Rep., school superintendent.

At this election the vote did not exceed 350.

At the June election of 1886 the vote of Klamath county totaled 596, a gain of 265 since June, 1884. The election was quite hotly contested, and the Democrats secured a majority of the county officers. The result:

For Congressman—N. L. Butler, Dem., 304; Binger Hermann, Rep., 292; Robert A. Miller, Dem., 2.

For Sheriff—M. D. Childers, Dem., 310; Charles Putnam, Rep., 241.

For Clerk—Charles P. Hughes, Dem., 242; W. C. Hale, Rep., 403.

For Surveyor—J. B. Griffith, Dem., 275; Rufus Moore, Rep., 276.

For Assessor—R. B. Hatton, Dem., 286; W. F. Arant, Rep., 261.

John Wells, Democrat, who was elected county commissioner, failed to qualify, and James L. Hanks, Democrat, was appointed in his place.

Over 700 votes were cast at the June election of 1888, a gain of more than 100 in two years. Again were the Democrats successful in securing a majority of the county officers. There were Democratic majorities, also, for candidates on state and district tickets. The official vote:

For Congressman—Binger Hermann, Rep., 336; John M. Gearin, Dem., 369.

For Prosecuting Attorney—William M. Colvig, Dem., 416.

For Joint Senator—C. M. Cartwright, Rep., 313; C. A. Cogswells, Dem., 385.

For Joint Representative—S. J. Studley, Rep., 321; S. P. Moss, Dem., 380.

The returns for the presidential election of 1888 are not obtainable but the number of votes cast in Klamath county Tuesday, November 6th, for the presidential candidates were about 750, with a Democratic majority of 89.

There was a small gain in the spring vote of 1890 over that of 1888. The Republican county ticket fared somewhat better than usual. The Republicans elected the county judge, sheriff, clerk and treasurer. They also carried the county for Hermann for congressman. The Democrats carried the state and district tickets. The official vote:

There was quite a change from the regular Democratic victories at the spring election of 1892. At this contest every Republican on the county ticket was elected with the exception of the candidate for assessor. On the district ticket, also, the Republican candidates carried the county, failing only on the member of the state board of equalization. The People's party had a ticket in the field for the first time and polled a very respectable vote. The total vote was about the same as that of 1888. The official result:

The election of June 6, 1898, was hotly contested and resulted in a pronounced victory for the Republican forces. ## CHAPTER IX

EDUCATIONAL.

It was not until the fall of 1870 that the juvenile population of the Klamath country reached a number making it necessary to provide a school for their education. This initial school was at that time established at Linkville. From the county no funds could be obtained for school purposes, but this fact did not deter the citizens from raising an amount of money sufficient to pay a teacher and rent a building for school purposes. A gentleman by the name of Nail was secured to teach, and Klamath county's first school was in full swing. From its inception the attendance was fairly good, including many half-breed children. After this school had been conducted three months it was possible to secure county aid; the Linkville school was organized by the county court. Mrs. Chauncey Nye taught the second term.

The second school in the county was not far behind the Linkville institution and was established near the present town of Bonanza, in the Lost River settlement.

The third school was in the Plevna district, southwest of Linkville. Three patriotic settlers furnished $75 each and about 1877 erected a school house. School commenced with four pupils.

Such was the educational genesis of Klamath county. Other schools were established in the Klamath country, and by 1883, just after the organization of Klamath county, we find that there were 345 children between the ages of 4 and 21 years, of which 164 were enrolled. The average daily attendance was 131.

The following table shows the number of children from 4 to 20 years old in the county, the number enrolled and the average daily attendance in public schools each year from the organization of the county up to and including 1903:

Year.	No. Children.	No. Enrolled.	Av. Daily Attend.
1884	417	190	220
1885	474	236	133
1886	582	249	162
1887	630	318	194
1888	792	384	245
1889	911	437	277
1890	876	551	330
1891	907	609	360
1892	927	625	380
1893	964	573	409
1894	988	624	388
1895	1028	650	442
1896	1052	701	511
1897	1065	758	595
1898	1114	752	490
1899	1107	758	492
1900	1033	736	474
1901	1073	728	405
1903	1168	818	475

Educational facilities in Linkville during the early days were limited. School was held in a little, primitive wooden shack, crowded with scholars. It was a disgrace to the otherwise thriving town. A writer in the Star of July 25, 1885, said: "No citizen of pride would, if he could avoid it, point out our excuse of a school house, east of town, to an eastern man, as our institution of learning."

At last the people of Linkville, ashamed of the public school facilities, called a mass meeting, December 1, 1885, and took steps toward securing a suitable building to cost not less than $5,000. Still no progress was made, although numerous other meetings were held.

Finally a building was erected, but at a cost much less than the original sum suggested, the new school house being erected for $1,550. Up to the present writing this building has been in commission, but otherwise educational interests are keeping abreast of the times. Saturday, May 28, 1904, District No. 1 voted to issue bonds to the amount of $11,500 to erect a public school building which edifice is now in process of erection and will be a credit to the county seat.

Late in 1901 agitation was begun in Klamath Falls for the founding of a high school. This was continued until the high school became a fact, as it is now being erected, the contract price for which is $29,500. Previously students were compelled to go outside the county in order to secure a higher education. The act providing for the founding of a county high school was passed by the Oregon Legislature and approved by the governor February 26, 1901, and under this act the people of Klamath county proceeded to make their plans. It was necessary to put the question to a vote, which was done at the general election, June 2, 1902. The result was, for high school, 597; against high school, 161. January 12, 1905, the county court made a six-mill levy to secure funds with which to erect a county high school to cost $25,000. This will be a handsome structure with all modern improvements and up to date in every respect. However, the contract price for the high school building is $29,500.

The latest available report of Klamath county schools is that of 1903:

KLAMATH COUNTY

THOMAS H. WILKERSON is well and favorably known in Klamath county. He resides one mile southeast of Lorella where he has an estate of two hundred and forty acres, well improved and in a high state of cultivation. He handles considerable stock and is known as one of the prosperous men of the community. His birth occurred in Monroe county, Missouri, on January 17, 1842. The father of our subject, William Wilkerson, is a native of Kentucky and an early pioneer to Monroe county, Missouri, arriving there about 1819. In 1850, he crossed the plains with ox teams accompanied by his three brothers. After working for some time in the mines, he started home in 1852 and was taken sick on the Isthmus of Panama. From that place he was transferred to the Island of Cuba, where he died the next year. His father, William Wilkerson, the grandfather of our subject, was born in England and came to the United States when quite young being one of the early settlers of the county. He was well acquainted with Daniel Boone, served in the War of 1812 and was a captain in the Black Hawk War. He did a great deal of scouting in Virginia and once was captured by the Indians, who held him for three years. His death occurred in Monroe county, Missouri, when he was aged ninety-two. The mother of our subject, Margaret (Dale) Wilkerson, was born in Tennessee and came to Monroe county, Missouri, with her parents when she was a child, it being about 1827. She made a trip to Oregon with our subject in 1875 and two years later returned to Monroe county where she died in 1878. Her father, John Dale, was a lieutenant in the battle of New Orleans, and a captain in the battle of Tippecanoe. He was captured there by some Indians but as they were taking him away, he struck one into the water with a paddle and so escaped. He was known as John Dale, of Tippecanoe fame. The Dales were all of Irish extraction and our subject's uncle, Matthew Dale, lived to be one hundred and ten years of age. The brothers and sisters of our subject are named as follows: John, deceased; Wiley, in Monroe county, Missouri; Sarah, wife of Alexander Clemens, a brother of the famous Mark Twain, and they now live in Monroe county, Missouri; Ross in Monroe county, Missouri; Mary, deceased; Milton in Monroe county; and Nancy, deceased. Our subject was the fifth from the last. He grew up on a farm in Missouri, attended school in the little log cabin of the day, being obliged to walk many miles even for that. In the spring of 1862, he started across the plains with Dr. Hugh Glenn's train who was afterwards a noted land owner of California. Mr. Wilkerson drove a band of mules across the plains and then mined in California for some time. He was at Virginia City in 1867 and returned via the Panama route to New York city, whence he journeyed back to Missouri. He had been very successful in the west and in Missouri engaged in farming and stock raising.

On September 11, 1873, Mr. Wilkerson married Julia Hardwick, a native of Monroe county, Missouri. George Hardwick, her father, was born in the same county and died in Yamhill county, Oregon, in 1895, being then sixty years of age. His father, John Hardwick, was born in Madison county and was one of the early settlers of Monroe county, Missouri. Many of the ancestors of this family were in the Revolution. Mrs. Wilkerson's mother, Mary A. (Sisk) Hardwick, was born in Alabama and most of her ancestors came from North Carolina. She died in Missouri. The brothers and sisters of Mrs. Wilkerson are named as follows, she being the oldest: Jethro, of Portland, Oregon; Lucy, deceased; John, of Marion county, Oregon; Clementine, deceased; George T.; and Mrs. Dollie Leveatt, both of Yamhill county, Oregon. In the fall of 1875, our subject started west with his wife and family, being accompanied by his mother and his wife's father and family. They headed toward Oregon and in due time arrived on the Pacific coast and located in West Chehalem valley. There he was engaged in general merchandising for eleven years. Not being especially successful, he sold out and came to his present place in June, 1886. He took up a homestead and engaged in stock raising and farming. Few settlers were here then and the hard winter of 1889-90 swept nearly all of his stock away. Since then, however, he has been prospered and has gained a nice holding of property. His residence is a fine two story eleven room structure, which is surrounded with fine improvements and makes a beautiful place. The children born to this family are Nora M., wife of James Krogue; Ella L., wife of Clarence Walker; Eugene W.; William L.; Clementine M., wife of Charles Wiley; Geneva A., a school teacher; Mary, Lulu and Kenneth C. Ella used to teach school. The children are all located near by and the two oldest have ranches in this vicinity. Our subject and his wife are consistent members of the Christian church and also two of their daughters belong to that denomination. They are known as substantial, upright, and good people and fully deserve the generous confidence and esteem bestowed upon them by their fellows.

CHARLES C. LEWIS is one of the younger men of Klamath county, who has demonstrated his ability to make a financial success in general farming and stock raising as is evidenced by his present holding. He resides one mile south of Olene and his birth occurred on May 27, 1875, in Custer county, Colorado. His father, Leonard A. Lewis, was born in Indiana and served in the Civil War. He came to Colorado, where he did farming and stock raising and in 1885, journeyed west to Klamath valley. He settled on Round Lake first and later went to Klamath Falls. That was his home until a short time previous to his death, when he went to Eureka Springs for his health. There in March, 1902, he passed into the world beyond. He had married Mary A. Bruner, a native of Iowa who survives him and is now dwelling in Klamath Falls. Our subject accompanied his parents on their various trips and received the balance of his education in the agricultural college at Corvallis. Owing to his father's ill health, he was obliged to stop the course and in 1896 he came home and engaged in stock raising. He purchased the old homestead and operated there until 1900 when he sold his property and purchased a farm where he now resides. It consists of two hundred and eighty acres, two hundred of which are agricultural land. Three fourths of this land is under cultivation and eighty acres are seeded to alfalfa. The entire alfalfa field is irrigated from large springs on his farm. Mr. Lewis has improved the place with his own hands and has splendid buildings, an orchard of all varieties of fruits and other things needed in the carrying on of his farm. He formerly handled considerable stock but now has sold the stock and gives attention to raising grain and hay.

On June 2, 1901, Mr. Lewis married Miss Caroline Stockwell and to them one child, Leonard, has been born. Mr. Lewis is a member of the A. O. U. W., and is a well known and substantial man. He started here with no means whatever and took hold with his hands to carve out his fortune. So well has he succeeded that he is now rated as one of the well to do citizens of the county and bids fair to be one of the wealthy men here in the near future.

GEORGE W. COPELAND, an industrious farmer and stockman of Klamath county, resides some two miles east of Lorella. His father, William H. Copeland, was born in Ohio in 1852 and came west about thirty-five years ago. Settlement was made near Portland, Oregon, and in 1885 he came to Klamath county and located in Langell valley. He took up general farming and stock raising and now owns an estate of some four hundred acres, which is well improved with all necessary buildings, machinery and so forth. In addition to this fine estate, he also has a nice band of cattle. The mother of our subject, Mary L. (Nesmer) Copeland, was born in Arkansas. Her parents had crossed the plains in early days. The other child of the family besides our subject is Mrs. Martha M. Abbaloose of this county. George W. was born on August 17, 1871, in Columbia county, Oregon, and came to this county with his parents in 1885. His education was received in the various places where he lived during his boyhood days and as soon as he became of age he began farming for himself and took a homestead where he now resides. He has added a quarter section more and improved the place with good residence, barns, orchard and so forth. The estate is cropped almost entirely to hay for his cattle, of which he owns a goodly number.

On June 17, 1902, Mr. Copeland married Miss Bessie McClung, who was born in California, the daughter of Carter and Mary McClung. Two children are the fruit of this union, Floyd L. and Flossie Marie. Mr. Copeland has the distinction of having started for himself in this county with no means and gained his entire property by the fruit of his own industry and sagacity. He is a modest, unassuming man and one of the solid, substantial citizens of our county.

HENRY T. ANDERSON was born on April 9, 1850, near St. Louis, Missouri. He now resides five miles northeast from Merrill, where he owns a good estate and gives his attention to farming and stock raising. His father, Richard Anderson, was born in Virginia and came as a pioneer to the vicinity of St. Louis and served as a soldier in the confederate army. During the battle of Prairie Grove, one of his legs was shattered by a ball. Nevertheless he fought all through the battle and died from the effects of the wound. His father was Richard Anderson, the grandfather of our subject, and was a prominent planter of Virginia and owned many slaves. Our subject's mother, Eliza (Brand) Anderson, died when he was a small boy. He was the second of a family of three, the others being Mrs. Emma B. Albin, of Chico, California and Robert C., near Merrill. Henry T. was reared on a farm and educated in the public schools and in the spring of 1870 started west. He finally landed in Sacramento valley and went to work for wages. Afterwards, he rented a farm, then journeyed to Colusa county, California. In 1882, he moved to Ashland and wrought on the S. P. railroad. In the spring of 1884, he came to Klamath county and took his present place as a homestead. Here he has resided since. He also took a timber culture and then bought a quarter section, which gave him the generous allowance of four hundred and eighty acres which is all fenced and over three hundred acres in cultivation. Among the improvements, is a seven room, two story house, large barn, plenty of outbuildings, a good well and wind mill, orchard and other accessories. Some two miles east from Merrill, Mr. Anderson owns three hundred and eighty acres of choice farm land all under the plow. Two hundred and twenty acres are producing alfalfa and the other one hundred and sixty, grain. He has a nice large herd of cattle, some horses, and a good many of them well bred. When Mr. Anderson started here, he had no means and he has labored here to gain his present holdings and is to be commended for the success he has achieved. He has won many friends and a popularity in the county, which was demonstrated in 1898, when he was elected county commissioner on the Democratic ticket. For thirty-four years he had been absent from his old home near St. Louis and in May, 1904, accompanied by his wife, who had not seen her parents in Illinois for twenty-eight years, he journeyed east and visited the world's fair and the old farm places, both of his wife's and his own native home. The trip was fraught with many pleasures and is one of the prominent incidents of Mr. Anderson's life.

On November 30, 1877, Mr. Anderson married Miss Mary Crawford, who was born in Perry county, Illinois, the daughter of Jacob J. and Eliza (Wiedon) Crawford, natives of Tennessee and Kentucky, respectively. Mrs. Anderson is the oldest of a family of twelve children. Her people moved to the Sacramento valley in 1876 and there her marriage occurred. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are Frank, married to Grace Sims, of this county; Charles I., Herbert E., Dora M., Pearlle, and Gladys E. In 1882 Mr. Crawford came to Klamath county, then went to Ashland and finally returned to this county, where he died in 1897, aged sixty-six. His widow resides with her children.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are good, substantial people, well known and highly esteemed and their labors and uprightness have won for them much success and many friends.

CHARLES H. HOAGLAND is one of the prosperous farmers and leading citizens of Klamath county. He resides some three miles east of Bonanza and was born on March 9, 1863, in Coles county, Illinois. His father, Henry W. Hoagland, came to California in 1852, then went to Oregon and afterward returned to Illinois. Again he crossed the plains, both times with ox teams, the last time being in 1865. He settled a second time in California, and finally, in 1879, came to Klamath county, where he died in 1890. The mother of our subject is Jane Hoagland, who is now living in Central Point, Oregon. There were ten children in the family. Our subject came with his parents in 1865 across the plains to Napa county, California, then moved to Merced county and accompanied them later to Langells valley in 1879. Few settlers were here then and his father purchased the first place that had been taken in the valley, which our subject owns at this time. It is one of the most valuable pieces of land in the county, being very fertile, and on the bottom. The father engaged in farming and stock raising and became very prosperous and had much land and stock but sold all except this quarter before he died.

On July 1, 1884, Mr. Hoagland married Miss Margaret Burzan, who was born in Jackson county, Oregon. Her father is deceased and her mother is living in that county now. Six children have been born to our subject and his wife, Bird, wife of Levi McDonald of this valley, Georgia, Emma, Lewis, Fernie and Grace.

Mr. Hoagland is a member of the A. O. U. W. and has the distinction of having gained his entire property through his own efforts of industry, since he started here with no means whatever.

FRED L. POPE. Among the enterprising men of Klamath county, it is with pleasure that we are privileged to mention the gentleman whose name appears above. He is a progressive farmer and stockman, residing some three miles east of Merrill and was born on September 15, 1861, in Hillsboro, Iowa. His father, James W. Pope, was born in Highland county, Ohio, and was an early pioneer to Henry county, Iowa. His father, Samuel Pope, the grandfather of our subject, was a native of Virginia and one of the earliest pioneers in Ohio. He died in Iowa at the age of ninety-three. The mother of our subject was Eliza J. (Stephenson) Pope, a native of Indiana. She came to Iowa where her wedding occurred. Her father, Dr. Samuel Stephenson, was born in Ireland, came to Indiana, then moved to Iowa, where he died at the age of eighty-four. The brothers and sisters of our subject are mentioned as follows: Elizabeth D., Edgar B., Mrs. Fannie B. Kane and Mrs. Margaret Thompson, twins, and Mrs. Bertie Auble, all of Modoc county, California. Fred L. was the oldest of the family and was much associated with his father in the various occupations in the different places where they resided. In 1864, the parents crossed the plains with wagons, being members of a very large train. They came direct to Yreka, California, and until 1870, the father followed teaming and freighting. Then he came to Stone Coal valley in Modoc county, being the first man that took a claim in that valley. A short time thereafter he removed to Hot Springs valley, a distance of seven miles, where he secured three hundred and twenty acres of land. Since that time, he has made that place his home. For a while he was postmaster at Canby but his attention has been largely given to stock raising. At this time he is about sixty-eight years of age. Our subject's mother died in 1887. He grew up on a ranch and worked at home for wages until he rented the Davis ranch, where he engaged in farming and stock raising, and where he made his start in life. In November, 1898, he sought out his present place and bought it; it consists of two hundred and sixty-five acres. In June of the following year, he moved his family here and this has been his home place since. He has a nice eight room residence, barn, other outbuildings, shade trees, and so forth and the place is one of the best ones of the county. Forty acres are bearing alfalfa and the entire estate is good land, producing hay and grain. Mr. Pope also owns one hundred and twenty-seven acres just east of Merrill, half of which is producing alfalfa and the balance is used for grain and pasture. Mr. Pope makes a specialty of raising choice Shorthorn cattle and has been favored with splendid success in the enterprise.

On March 27, 1892, Mr. Pope married Miss Dora O. Ballard, a native of Modoc county, California. Her father, James L. Ballard, was born in Illinois and came as a pioneer to California. He was a skilled carpenter and wrought on the state capital at Sacramento and in many other important places. As early as 1872, he brought his family to Modoc county and there died in 1902. He was a millwright as well as carpenter and built the first sawmill in Hot Spring valley. He married Serilda Thornton, a native of Missouri who is now living in Modoc county. Mrs. Pope's brothers and sisters are Simeon T., Charles A., Nora E., Anna H., James T., Jesse L., John R. and William. She is the third child. To our subject and his wife five children have been born, Leslie B., I. Leland, Marjorie D., Wanda M., and Fred L., Jr.

When the time came for Mr. Pope to start in life, his father was not in a position to assist him with any capital, consequently with his bare hands and a good stout heart, he began the battle alone, and everything that he now owns is the result of his own labors. His mother taught school a great many years and was successful in this calling. Being the oldest of the family and much of the time on the frontier, he had little opportunity to gain an education compared with the youth of today, still he has made himself a well informed and well trained man mentally. He is enterprising and progressive, has many friends and is considered one of the leading men of this part of the county.

MAJOR JEROME WHITNEY, a native of Klamath county, and now residing two miles southeast of Merrill, was born in the house where he now lives, on October 29, 1875. The old homestead owned by his father is now owned by him and his brother, Johnson. The parents of our subject were Elkanah and Mary A. (White) Whitney, who are named more fully in the sketch of another son in this work. Our subject grew up in this county and received his education from the public schools. Early in life he began to work for himself. In the spring of 1898, in company with his two brothers, Albert and Daniel M., he started to Alaska, sailing from Portland, Oregon, with the intention of mining. They later turned from this intention, owing to the discouraging reports, and stopped at the Islands of Karluk and Kodiak and were engaged in the salmon fisheries there during the season. In the fall, they returned to San Francisco and thence journeyed home. Much of the time until his father's death, our subject was associated with him, then later purchased the homestead with his present partner. Before that, he was in partnership with all his brothers in the stock business and they prospered well until 1900, when they divided all their holdings. They still hold a large band of sheep altogether and are recognized as among the leading stockmen of the county. The place where our subject resides is a quarter section, half of which is growing alfalfa and the balance grain. The two brothers have a fine band of cattle and horses all well bred and the farm is stocked with everything needed to handle it in first class shape.

On August 16, 1900, Mr. Whitney married Miss Emma Shuck, a native of Canton, Illinois. She came with her parents, S. A. and Cornelia Shuck, to the Rogue river valley when a child. Later, they came to Klamath county, where her mother is now living. The father died on the ranch near Merrill in 1902. Mrs. Whitney's brothers and sisters are Charles, near Merrill; Mrs. Edith Warren of Canton, Illinois; Mrs. Clara E. Bush, deceased; Lora E. and Lois E., living with their mother. Mr. and Mrs. Whitney have one child, Chester Leroy. It speaks well of the industry of our subject when we know that he started in life without any means and owing to sagacious management of the resources placed in his hands, he is now one of the well-to-do citizens of Klamath county. He is a man of unquestioned integrity, surrounded by a wide circle of admiring friends and is to be credited with doing a great deal for the upbuilding of the county.

OSBERT E. IRVINE is one of the substantial and well known business men of Merrill. He is operating a first class hotel and owing to his skill and sagacity as host has met with a very gratifying patronage. He was born on July 27, 1862, in Buchanan county, Missouri, the son of John M. and Malissa (Gibson) Irvine, natives of Missouri and Virginia, respectively. The father is a veteran of the Civil war and for many years of his life was engaged as an educator. Our subject grew up in Missouri and there received his education. In 1879, he came west to Redding, California accompanying his parents and later they journeyed by wagon to Josephine county, Oregon. The father died April 4, 1880, and the family moved to Ashland. The mother is now living at Vancouver, Washington in her eightieth year. Our subject traveled over various portions of California, Oregon and Washington. Finally in 1885, he came to Klamath county. He wrought here at various places and did farming in Barnes valley. Finally, in May, 1899, he came to Merrill and since that time has been one of the active builders of this county. He now owns a good residence and eight lots in Merrill, also sixty acres of valuable land, one-half mile south of the town. The agricultural land is all under cultivation and well improved. Mr. Irvine gives his attention amost entirely to his hotel and oversees his other interests.

On December 15, 1896, occurred the marriage of Mr. Irvine and Miss Florence Gibson, a native of Arkansas. She came with her parents to Oregon when a child. One child has been born to this union, Erle M.

Mr. Irvine is a member of the W. O. W. and a good progressive man.

GARRETT K. VANRIPER is to be classed as one of the pioneers of the territory now embraced in Klamath county. When he came here it was Jackson county, later Lake county, and now Klamath county. Thus, he has lived in three counties without moving from his farm. His residence adjoins Bonanza on the west. He was born on June 20, 1863, in Douglas county, Oregon, the son of Hon. Garrett B. and Sarah (Cozad) VanRiper, natives of New York and Pennsylvania, respectively. The father was reared in Michigan and in the spring of 1850, came across the plains in wagons to Douglas county, Oregon, and took a donation claim and engaged in farming. In 1870, he came to Poe valley, this county and built the first house in that valley. While in western Oregon, he had participated in the Rogue river Indian war. The Modoc War broke out after he settled in Poe valley and realizing the danger he hurried his family to a place of safety, just in time to escape the ravages of the savages, for they burned his house and destroyed all his property but a few hours after he had left. After the war, he built another house and in 1885, moved to Bonanza. Later, he settled in Ashland and there died in 1902, aged seventy-three. He had always lived on the frontier and was a genuine pioneer. In 1874, he was a member of the state legislature, this then being Jackson county and he was instrumental in getting Lake county organized. It embraced this territory. The ancestors are traced back to the Mayflower and come of Holland Dutch extraction. The mother's ancestors came from France. She now lives in Ashland, aged sixty-nine. The other children of the family besides our subject are Mrs. Anna Walker, in Langell valley; Mrs. Fannie Hughes, of Poe Valley; Mrs. Ida Crane, of Sacramento, California; Gard P., of Ashland. Our subject grew up on the farm and received his education from the early schools in the various places where he lived then graduated from the old normal school at Ashland, Oregon. He has been engaged in stock raising most of his life and has made several trips with stock to California. In 1885, he located his present home as a homestead and here he has remained ever since. He now has one-half section, well improved and mostly under cultivation. A good barn, windmill, pump and various other buildings are in evidence, while his residence is a very comfortable dwelling. Mr. VanRiper pays especial attention to raising hay and cattle and also handles some fine horses.

On June 13, 1888, Mr. VanRiper married Miss Nellie Patterson, who was born in Butte county, California, and for the past eighteen years has lived in this vicinity. The children of our subject and his wife are Garrett K., Jr., Jessie H., Lillie and Josie. Mr. VanRiper has always taken a marked interest in political matters and the advancement and development of the community and especially in educational affairs. He has given of his time and served on the board and is a very enthusiastic supporter of everything for the benefit of the county.

A sturdy and capable frontiersman, a substantial and good man, he has not only won success in his labors during this time but has also won many friends and a fine standing. When he landed here in the fall of 1878, he was without means and had a family to support. Consequently there was much arduous labor and many trying experiences to pass through but he and his family have weathered all and he has become one of the prosperous and well-to-do men of the country.

Joseph Nichols was born on April 1, 1844, in

Payne, residing near Denver, Colorado; Nathan, of Union county, Oregon; Taylor living near Bonanza. Our subject is the third from the last. In August, 1862, he enlisted in Company F, Thirty-eighth Iowa Volunteer Infantry and was in the department of the Gulf of Mexico. He participated in the siege of Vicksburg, the capture of Fort Morgan and Mobile and saw much hard service. He was injured at Vicksburg and for several months languished in the hospital. During the siege he was obliged to work four nights out of each week. He continued in the service until September, 1865, being then honorably discharged. Many times he was on short rations and on the verge of starvation and was in many trying scenes where his comrades were falling all about him, yet he escaped with his life and the consciousness that he had fought well for his flag. Shortly after his discharge, he went to Lawrence, Kansas and in 1875, came to Placer county, California. The following winter his father joined him and in the fall of 1878, they came to what is now Klamath county. Mr. Nichols located his present place, which is one and one-fourth miles north of Bonanza, as a homestead and his father took one adjoining. The latter lived there until his death on November 18, 1898, being at that time one hundred years, nine months and twenty-nine days old. Mr. Short turns his attention almost entirely to raising grain and potatoes, in which he has made a good success. He has one son, Burrill, owning half a section near the home place, two hundred acres of which are under a ditch and one hundred acres planted to alfalfa. They handle some stock, mostly cattle. Bloomingcamp was born at Eureka, Siskiyou county, California, December 23, 1879. His brother was born at the same place February 13, 1877. They are sons of John F. and Adeline Bloomingcamp, both natives of Germany. The parents came to California during the 60's and are now engaged in the stock business in Siskiyou county, the father being now seventy-one years of age and the mother five years his junior. Our subject is a member of a family of ten children, equally divided at to sex.

Our subject engaged in the stock business on Sprague river in 1890, and seven years later formed his present partnership with his brother. He started in the business with no means, and today the firm is in a state bordering on wealth. The brothers have on Sprague river a tract of twelve hundred and forty acres, most of which is choice hay land, and in the Klamath basin they own four hundred and eighty acres of good real estate. They make a specialty of raising hay which they feed to their large herd of choice cattle. Having been born and reared on the frontier, and trained from infancy in the handling of stock, they are eminently fitted for their business and are making it a signal success.

CALEB TOWNSEND OLIVER is the owner and operator of one of the finest livery barns in southwestern Oregon. It is located at Merrill, while he also has one at Klamath Falls, and they are certainly a source of pride to the county. Being a practical horse man and especially endowed with talent for the business, Mr. Oliver has made a success in his enterprise, which is very gratifying and bespeaks both his ability and his industry. In addition to general livery, feed and sale business, wherein he is most careful in every particular to provide for his patrons everything first class, he also has taken a great interest in breeding fine horses for the betterment of the county stock. Mr. Oliver has eight as fine stallions as are to be seen in southern Oregon, everyone of which is registered, and everyone of which is a choice prize winner. His barn is next his Mascot stables and his stallion, Mascot, is one of the finest horses in the west. At this writing, he is a little over four years of age and when four years of age weighed exactly twenty-two hundred pounds. When he has finished his growth, he will weigh at least twenty five hundred pounds. He is a cross between a registered Clyde and a registered Percheron. He is one of the most beautiful draft horses to be found and certainly the stock men of Klamath county are to be congratulated that through the untiring efforts of Mr. Oliver, have been brought to Klamath county such magnificent stallions. Mr. Oliver owns choice driving horses and has some of the best roadsters in this part of the state. His driving teams are known all over and some of the finest rigs to be found on the roads come from his barns. He takes great pride in securing the comfort and safety of his patrons and altogether is one of the most successful gentlemen and up-to-date business men to be found in Klamath county.

Joseph C. Oliver was born in Iowa. With his parents, he went to Ohio when young and graduated from Miami university. He was then retained in the college as an instructor, continuing there until the breaking out of the Civil War. Then he enlisted in the Eighty-ninth Ohio Infantry as private and was soon promoted to a captaincy. He served under General Thomas and at the battle of Chickamauga was taken prisoner. For three months he languished in that infamous den, then with three companions, dug his way out. They were six weeks in getting away and finally when they reached their own lines, they were almost naked and had traveled barefooted through snow and over the frozen ground. He then took part in Sherman's march to the Sea and was in command of two companies. He participated in many hard fought battles and in numerous skirmishes and served in all four years. Then he received his honorable discharge and since has been very prominent in G. A. R. circles. When the war ended he returned home and again took up teaching and later was principal of the public schools in Champaign, Illinois.

At Goshen, Ohio, he was married to Martha Washington Gatch, who was born at Mulberry, Ohio. She had followed teaching school for several years and was a very prominent educator. Her father, John D. Gatch, was born in Baltimore, removing to Virginia and later settled in Ohio. They were descendants from Godfrey Gatch and came from England in 1727 and settled in the vicinity of Baltimore. The colony established was known as the Gatch settlement and the Methodist church was organized by them which was known as Gatch chapel. One of the noted members of the family was Rev. Philip Gatch, who was a powerful speaker and one of the noted pioneers of Ohio. He did very much throughout Ohio and especially in Clermont county, preaching the gospel, being a fervent and devout Methodist. He attended the first conference ever held in America, which was in 1773. He was appointed the first judge of Clermont county in 1800 and represented that county and the first constitutional convention ever held in the northwest territory, it being 1802. After that, he gave his whole life to preaching the gospel and was a noble and successful man. He was born in 1751. During colonial days, many of the Gatch family had titles of honor for various works that they had done. They are a very prominent and strong American family. Our subject's father taught in various places in the west then came to Santa Barbara county, California in 1873 and was principal of the public schools there until 1880, when he moved to Los Angeles and engaged in the real estate business. He is still operating in this capacity and is one of the very successful men of that state. The children of the family are Nellie, a teacher in the schools of Los Angeles; Caleb T., who is our subject; J. Scott, a writer of considerable merit now on the St. Louis Globe-Democrat; Byron L., a graduate of Ann Arbor, and a leading attorney of Los Angeles and a noted orator; Myrtle G., wife of Professor Frederick Stien, who is teaching in the Philippines. Our subject was well educated and from a child showed a marked talent for handling horses. Early in life, he gave himself to this and the result is that he is today one of the most successful horsemen in the state of Oregon. He worked with horses in various places in California and came to this county in 1884. He was handling horses for a firm on salary for a time and finally located some sage brush land near Merrill and commenced raising horses for himself. He had come to this country on horseback from southern California. He succeeded very well until 1890, when a hard winter swept away all his stock. He restocked and stayed with the business until 1904, at which time he owned two hundred of the finest horses and cattle in Klamath county. Then he sold the ranch and engaged in his present business, commencing in a very modest way.

The business has grown continuously since under his wise guidance and he stands today one of the representative men of this part of the state. He early began bringing in pure bred stallions of different breeds that he could purchase and the result is that Klamath county has come to have some of the best horses to be found in the west.

On October 21, 1890, Mr. Oliver married Miss Frances Gertrude Brown, a native of Woodland, California and born August 20, 1873. Her father, John T. Brown, was an early pioneer to California from Minnesota. He had married West Anna Lyle. To Mr. and Mrs. Oliver, one child, John Joseph, has been born.

Since the above was written, Mr. Oliver has purchased the Exchange stables of Klamath Falls, and is handling them in connection with those at Merrill. The stables in both places are named Mascot Stables, and they are to be numbered with the very best in the entire Northwest. Mr. Oliver named his stables from his magnificent stallion Mascot, which, undoubtedly, is as fine a horse as can be found on the coast.

GEORGE WASHINGTON OFFIELD is well known in Merrill where he has resided for some time. He owns about three hundred acres of choice agricultural land besides a fine residence and eight lots in Merrill. He was born on January 14, 1868 in Parkersburg, Coos county, Oregon, thus having the distinction of being a native Oregonian. His father, John L. Offield, came from English ancestry. He married Amanda E. Vance, of French extraction. Our subject grew up in his native place and spent his time between laboring on the farm and attending the public schools until he was sixteen years of age. Then he started out for himself, working at various occupations, on the farms, in the stores and so forth all through western Oregon and northwest California. At the age of twenty-seven, he discovered that it would be more to his advantage for him to be skilled in educational matters, consequently he began studying in a private business college at Bonanza, Oregon. In addition to the business course which he completed in due time, he had made special progress in various other branches and came from the institution fairly skilled in an ordinary English education. After quitting the course, he took the Civil service examination under the government for bookkeeping and secured one hundred as his mark, a very remarkable standing. Later, he took another examination in other branches and secured ninety one per cent. In 1886, he had come to this county and after his examination, he spent three years in teaching here. Then he purchased a ranch and has added since until he has the amount mentioned, which is all first class agricultural lands. One half of it is under cultivation and he produces alfalfa and grain. In 1901, Mr. Offield accepted a position as bookkeeper of the Whitney Mercantile Co., of Merrill, which position he still holds. His residence is a nice six room cottage and he also has other property besides which has been mentioned.

On October 1, 1899, Mr. Offield married Miss Winifred Brown, who was born near Pueblo, Colorado, the daughter of Rice and Mary Brown, the latter deceased. Mr. Brown was a native of Missouri and immigrated to California in early day and about twenty-two years ago, came to Ashland, Oregon. In 1886, he settled in Klamath county and is now living some nine miles west of Klamath Falls. Mrs. Offield has one brother, Madison, of Billings, Montana. Three children have been born to our subject and his wife, Elda Ruby, Lester Clifford and Vera Viola.

He and his wife are members of the Baptist church and are highly esteemed people. Mr. Offield is serving his second term as justice of the peace and also is in his second term as mayor of the town of Merrill. In 1900, he was nominated by the Democratic party for county superintendent of schools but as the county was Republican, he lost the day by a very small majority.

WALTER F. REED is the proprietor of the Pioneer hotel, and is postmaster at Bly, Oregon. He is a native of Plymouth county, Iowa, born September 2, 1871. His father, George Reed, now a cabinet maker at Paisley, Oregon, was born in the province of New Brunswick and came to Massachusetts in 1865. Five years later he went to Iowa and from Iowa to Colorado in 1872. From the latter state he went to Wyoming and in 1887 he came to Oregon and settled in Ashland. Two years later he came to Lake county, where he has since lived. Mr. Reed's mother is Anna E. (Mitchell) Reed, a native of New Brunswick. The family is composed of the father, mother and three children, of which our subject is the second in point of age. He has a brother, Herbert E., residing near Paisley; and a sister, Mrs. Maud E. McCormack, who lives in California.

Mr. Reed grew to manhood on his parents' stock farm. The family was the second that lived in what is now Sheridan county, Wyoming, where they remained eight years. Sheridan county was at that time included in Johnson county. The Reed home was situated only about forty miles from the scene of the historic Custer massacre. The family experienced no trouble with the Indians while in Wyoming, but while living in Colorado the savages were on the warpath and made life for the settlers decidedly disagreeable. Large game, such as deer, elk, antelope and buffalo, was plentiful at that time, and Mr. Reed can recall the times when he has watched his father stand in his door and shoot the later named animals with his rifle.

Our subject attended school at Ashland, Oregon, and at the age of twenty he engaged in the sheep business with his father and brother. They also farmed to some extent and did a great amount of contract work, during harvest time, harvesting hay. Mr. Reed was always successful in what he undertook and as a result is now in well-to-do circumstances. He owns near Paisley one hundred and sixty acres of land. The farm where he resides consists of a quarter section of well improved land and may be irrigated by a ditch, in which he is heavily interested. He purchased this in 1903. The farm is known as the Bly ranch. In Bly, Mr. Reed owns the Pioneer hotel, as has been stated, containing twenty rooms, and he is also the proprietor of a large livery and feed stable, and keeps the stage station for the Klamath Falls & Lakeview stage company.

On September 25, 1892, Mr. Reed was married to Mattie B. Mulkey, a native of Missouri and daughter of Willis J. and Mary E. Mulkey. Mr. and Mrs. Mulkey came to Oregon eighteen years ago and are now engaged in running a hotel at Eugene, Oregon.

To Mr. and Mrs. Reed have been born five children, Archie M., Helen M., Bennie A., Richard W., and Violet B.

In addition to the property already enumerated Mr. Reed owns the town hall of Bly, a building twenty-six by sixty feet in dimensions, known as Reed's Hall. This hall is used for public entertainments and social gatherings.

FRANK OBENCHAIN is a prominent stock raiser residing on Merrill creek near the north bank of Sprague river, ten miles northwest from Bly. Born January 19, 1877, in Jacksonville, Oregon, Mr. Obenchain was the only child of Madison and Minnie (Crah) Obenchain, Oregon pioneers. The father was born in Buchanan county, Iowa, and crossed the plains to California during the early days. After one year in that state he came to Jackson county, Oregon and settled in the Sprague river valley in 1881. Here he died eight years ago. The mother is a native of Germany and is now living in Jacksonville, Oregon.

Our subject grew to maturity on a farm and was educated in the common schools of Jacksonville. He is now engaged in the cattle business and is making a success.

Mr. Obenchain was married June 8, 1898, to Carrie A. Wendt, daughter of Henry and Marie Wendt, both natives of Germany.

Mr. and Mrs. Obenchain have two children, Minnie Marie, and Madison.

They are prominent and well-to-do citizens and enjoy the respect and confidence of a wide circle of friends in southern Oregon.

THOMAS JEFFERSON OFFIELD is a well known business man of Klamath county where he has won splendid success in the financial world. He was born on January 23, 1870, in Coos county, Oregon. His father, John L. Offield, is a native of Indiana and came of English extraction. His father, William Offield, the grandfather of our subject, participated in the War of 1812. John L. Offield came across the plains in 1850 with ox teams and while en route, his mother died. He settled near Oregon City and later was appointed assessor of Clackamas county. He moved to Coos county after some time and to Klamath county in 1886. Three years later he journeyed to Lane county and then went to Ellensburg, in Washington in 1900, where he died the following year. He had married Amanda J. E. Vance, a native of Missouri. She came to Oregon in 1850 and is now living in Ellensburg, Washington. The children of the family are William H., of Tacoma; George W., of Merrill; Thomas J., our subject; Lafayette V., Arthur L., Walter and Nellie, all in Ellensburg. Our subject lived with his parents in the various places where they dwelt until 1886, when they came to Klamath county, then he began riding the range and in 1890, engaged with Geber brothers, wholesale butchers of Sacramento, on their ranch. Five years later, he was appointed as foreman and had charge of their business, shipping cattle, until the fall of 1903. In the winter of 1895, he took a lay off which continued for six months, during which time he traveled all over the states of California and Oregon, then resumed his work. On May 22, 1895, Mr. Offield married Miss Laura Maxim, who was drowned the following August while in bathing. On May 19, 1899, Mr. Offield married Mrs. Elizabeth Dorris of Yreka, California. She is a near relative of the late Senator Vest of Missouri. In 1890, Mr. Offield purchased one hundred and seventy-four acres of land one mile north of Merrill. He now has one hundred and fifty acres of this in fine alfalfa and in 1903, he purchased one hundred and forty acres more which he expects soon to seed to alfalfa. When he quit the Geber ranch, he engaged in the hotel business at Merrill and now owns the two story, Riverside hotel which has a fine bar in connection. He personally conducted the hotel until July, 1904, then rented it to Thomas A. Balis, still retaining a half interest in the bar. In addition to this, Mr. Offield has a mercantile establishment, which is under the charge of his wife. He also owns several lots and buildings in the town of Merrill and has a fine band of cattle on the range. His time is given largely to attending to his real estate and stock interests, although he superintends his other business matters.

Mr. Offield has shown himself a thorough and talented business man and has won a success which is very gratifying. He has the esteem and confidence of all who know him and has shown a generous and progressive spirit in the upbuilding of the country.

THOMAS W. GARRETT is a stock raiser residing three fourths of a mile northwest from Bly, Oregon. He was reared on a farm in St. Francis, county, Missouri, in which county and state he was born October 24, 1861. In May, 1884, he came west to the San Joaquin valley, California. Here he worked on a salary until the fall of 1886, when he came to Goose lake valley, Oregon, and procured employment on a stock ranch. In 1889 he took a homestead near Goose lake and afterwards purchased a quarter-section more of land adjoining. He sold his homestead in 1895, but still owns his remaining one hundred and sixty acres. He came to Bly in the fall of 1895, and for two years thereafter managed the Pioneer hotel at this place, after which he purchased his present home. He has in all two hundred and eighty acres of land, a good portion of which is valuable for agricultural purposes and well improved. Mr. Garrett also owns an interest in the irrigation ditch which runs through that section and can irrigate a great portion of his land. He is engaged extensively in raising hay for his large herd of cattle.

Mr. Garrett was married October 27, 1889, to May Millis, who passed away September 16, 1903, leaving no children.

Mr. Garrett's parents, William and Susan C. (Grider) Garrett, were both reared in the same county and state as was he. The mother died there in the month of April, 1900. The father made his home in that county until the fall of 1903, when he sold out and came to Bly. He is now sixty-eight years of age and makes his home with the subject of this sketch.

Thomas W. Garrett is now serving his third term as constable for the Sprague river precinct. He is a man of wide acquaintance and of great prestige in Lake county.

JOSEPH STUKEL is a native of Klamath county, having been born in Klamath Falls, on March 17, 1873, the son of Stephen and Delilah (Perdue) Stukel. He is one of the prosperous young men of the county and has demonstrated himself possessed of excellent ability. His labors have all been along the line of stock raising and farming for himself and in everything that tends to build up the country in general. He is widely known as a successful, substantial and capable man. The other members of the family are Frederick; Ollie, wife of S. M. Heller, in Iowa; Mamie, wife of G. W. Wilson of Merrill; Amy, wife of Bert Davis of Merrill; and Stephen, at home. Mr. Stukel resides some four miles northwest of Merrill on Lost River. The farm is beautifully situated at the foot of Stukel mountain and the bridge across Lost river at this point is known as Stukel bridge. When our subject was about four years of age, he came with his parents to this location, worked with his father, and gained his education, meanwhile.

On November 4, 1893, he married Florinda A. Booth, who was born in Iowa, the daughter of Shannon and Laura Jennings Booth. She had recently come from Iowa at the time of her marriage. He brothers and sisters are Olive, wife of G. W. Jory; Mamie, wife of Frederick Stukel; Ella, wife of Carl Robley; and Harry. To our subject and his wife, two children have been born, Goldie Olive and William Charles. In the spring of 1903, Mr. Stukel and his brother Fred purchased the home ranch where he had spent his days after he was twelve years of age and together they are now operating the same. The estate consists of five hundred and thirty-three acres, all fenced and all good land. Four hundred and fifty acres are under ditch and the balance will be irrigated from a new ditch now being constructed. This makes it an especially valuable place. It is well improved, with all buildings needed, having three barns, residence and so forth. They give their attention largely to handling stock and raising hay for the same on this valuable ranch. They grow some horses but mostly cattle, of which they have a large band at this time. The Stukel estate was one of the first places taken in this part of the county and it is considered one of the best ranches of its size in this portion of the state.

EDWIN CASEBEER. Born near the town of New Philadelphia, Ohio, August 18, 1849, Edwin Casebeer was the son of Josiah and Elizabeth (Mosier) Casebeer, and the fourth member of the family of five children. The following are the names of his sister and brothers: Mrs. Mary Morgan, Kansas; William Casebeer, Colorado; George, in Kansas; and Jacob M., at Ashland, Oregon.

Mr. Casebeer's father was a native of Pennsylvania, who, as a youth, emigrated to Ohio. From Ohio he removed to Buchanan county, Iowa, in about the year 1854, traveled extensively over the United States and finally settled in the Rogue river valley, Oregon, in 1873 and died seventeen years later in Ashland, Oregon, aged seventy-six years. The mother was a native of the state of New York and died during her eighty-seventh year in Ashland, Oregon, in the year 1903.

The first eighteen years of Mr. Casebeer's life were spent with his parents, after which he went to Sedgwick county, Kansas, where he engaged in the stock business, and upon attaining his majority he took a homestead. Kansas was comparatively a wild state at that time and Mr. Casebeer can recount many a buffalo killed by him almost from his door-step. In 1871 he came to California and to the Rogue river the year following. Here he engaged in ranching and fruit raising until 1879, when he came to the Sprague river valley and again engaged in the stock business. He brought into the country the first band of Hereford cattle to be imported into the Sprague river valley, and at the same time he imported a start in the mule raising business, which he has since successfully followed in conjunction with his cattle raising. In April, 1898, he took a band of mules into Alaska for sale. He went through British Columbia over the old Telegraph trail and up the Frazier river to Glenore, on the Stehikin river, where he disposed of his animals at a profit. From that point he went via dog sledge to Skagway, whence he took a steamer for home. While on this trip Mr. Casebeer suffered many hardships, such as frequently befalls travelers in the far north. On one occasion his supply of provisions became exhausted and he was compelled to sustain life for several days on a diet of badger meat.

In 1900 he sold his cattle and three years later invested in a flock of sheep and has been engaged in the raising of wool ever since. His sheep number some thousands and he also owns a thousand acres of fenced land, a few hundred acres of which is hay land and well improved with a large twelve-room house, two barns and other outbuildings in proportion. His dwelling is one of the largest and finest farm houses in the state of Oregon. His home lies three fourths of a mile east from Bly.

On October 28, 1889, occurred the marriage of Mr. Casebeer to Mrs. Caroline H. (Owen) Watts, a native of Clark county, Missouri, and daughter of James and Susan F. (Tull) Owen, natives, respectively, of the states of New York and Kentucky. Mr. Owen removed from the state of his birth to Hancock county, Illinois, where his parents both died, after which he went to Clark county, Missouri, being an early pioneer of that county. The brothers and sisters of Mrs. Casebeer are: John S., Haden Hill, California; Mrs. Mary L. Kilgore, Langell's valley, Oregon; Mrs. Margaret E. Long, Susanville, California; James H. Owen, residing near Bly; and George W. Owen, Ashland, Oregon.

Mrs. Casebeer's father, started across the plains as a member of a large train of emigrants bound for California. He had with him his wife and five children and experienced many hardships in making the journey on account of the hostility of the tribes inhabiting the plains. On one occasion the entire train narrowly escaped a massacre. His family were among the first to settle in the Sacramento valley, and lived in many places in California before coming to the Sprague river in 1878. Here Mr. Owen engaged in the stock business, and followed that occupation until his death in 1901. The mother died ten years previously.

Mrs. Casebeer was living in Aden, Modoc county, California, during the Modoc war, and several times during that struggle between the red men and the white she was a witness to the Indian war dance. In 1870 she was married to S. Watts, now deceased. She has two sons, John S. and James O. Watts, who are merchants of Bly.

Mr. and Mrs. Casebeer have two children, Edwin J. and Susie May Casebeer.

IVON D. APPLGATE. The name Applegate is indissoluble from the history of Oregon. No mention of the early history of this state to any extent can be made without including the labors of different members of this leading family. It is our purpose to deal particularly with the gentleman whose name stands at the head of this article and had we the full data, it would be very interesting to mention more fully regarding the other members of the family as well.

Ivon D. Applegate was born on January 25, 1840, in St. Clair county, Missouri. His father, Lindsay Applegate, was a native of this county and married Elizabeth Miller. As early as 1822, he settled in Missouri and there was married. In 1843 he crossed the plains and settled in the Willamette valley, Oregon. The history of that most wonderful trip in which these brave pioneers with their families wended their way through the unbroken regions of deserts and mountains, beset with wild animals and wilder men, forms an epoch in the history of this great country and Lindsay Applegate with his brothers took a very prominent part along with Dr. Whitman. They were men composed of the right material for such an enterprise as a calm review of their acts indicate and their subsequent lives prove. A limited account of that journey would fill a volume in itself and has been mentioned in other portions of this publication. In due time, Mr. Applegate reached the Willamette valley and with his brothers, settled near what is now Dallas, in Polk county, being among the very first settlers there. From this time, until Oregon assumed proportions of a prosperous territory, the Applegates were moving spirits in assisting emigration, in opening up the country, in fighting the savages and in all movements for the general good of the people. Their efforts were not confined to any local section but were as broad as the state itself and their influence was always for the good. Lindsay Applegate and his brother, Jesse, located the south road through the Tule lake country to the Willamette valley in 1846. Thus they were among the first pioneers of what is now Klamath county. In 1861, Lindsay Applegate was captain of the volunteers and he came through this vicinity again. Our subject was with him at that time and was appointed Indian agent and helped to establish the Indian reservation. The father died in 1891, aged eighty-three, Swan lake being the place of his demise. Our subject was with his parents on their memorable trip across the plains and lived with them in Polk county and received his education from home training and the primitive schools of the country and in 1850, went with them to Douglas county. In 1859 they journeyed to Jackson county and in 1862, he enlisted in the militia as captain. In 1864, he was appointed recruiting officer, by Governor A. C. Gibbs and stationed at Eugene. In 1868, he was appointed by Superintendent Huntington in charge of the commissary in the Indian department of the state. While in this position, he acted as interpreter of the Snake Indians and took charge of that trip, bringing them to the reservation. He established Yirmax agency in 1869. In 1870, he settled in Swan lake valley and laid aside public duties, preferring to devote himself to stock raising. The next year, however, he received a special appointment from the government as special representative to the Modoc Indian camp on Lost river and while in this capacity participated in the first battle of the Lava Beds, one of the first battles in the western Indian warfare. The personal bravery of Mr. Applegate is shown in that he went with six men in the very heat of danger to secure the bodies of some citizens who had been slain. He was a man who knew no fear and owing to this was most successful in handling the savages for the government, which has resulted in untold good to the pioneers. Mr. Applegate was among the very first settlers in this county, and has done a lion's share in developing it and stimulating others to worthy effort. In addition to his estate, he has a fine residence in Klamath Falls where he is making his home at the present time.

On July 14, 1871, in Jackson county, Mr. Applegate married Miss Margaret Hutchinson, a native of Pennsylvania and the daughter of Richard and Anna Armstrong Hutchinson. Mrs. Applegate came west in 1869. To this marriage, five children have been born, Alice A., who graduated from the state normal school at Monmouth and has been retained as a member of the faculty in the training department, and later was transferred to the Ashland normal as principal in one department, afterward was principal of the Klamath Falls public school and is now assistant principal of the Klamath Falls high school; Ada F., deceased, who was the wife of J. G. Pierce and was also a graduate of the state normal school; Moray Lindsay, who graduated from the state normal school at Monmouth in 1896. Following that he matriculated in the state university at Eugene and in 1898 enlisted in the Second Oregon Volunteers and served eighteen months in the Philippine wars. He was with Company C and participated in the principal campaign in that conflict. From the fourth of February until the following June he was in almost constant fighting and in 1898, he returned to the university and graduated with honors in 1900. In the fall of that year, he returned to Manila and was appointed assistant to the Superintendent of Public Instruction in that city. He continued in that capacity until 1902, then was with the ethnological survey. After that, he was collector for the Philippine exposition for the world's fair exhibit and directed that work until everything was completed for the exhibit. Later, he returned to Klamath county and now expects in the near future to enter the stock business with his father. Lena L. was educated at the state university and is now the wife of Dr. Hargis of Klamath Falls. Jessie is still at home.

Mr. and Mrs. Applegate are leading people in Klamath county and as stated before, the Applegates are leading people in the state of Oregon. Our subject is a man of unquestioned integrity whose life has shown forth self sacrifice and uprightness and whose labors have been most excellent in bringing about the development of the county and the state of Oregon. He has been a great benefactor to his fellow men and receives what is right, a most generous compensation in esteem, respect and love.

CHARLES NEWTON MEYER, a farmer and stock man residing three and one-half miles southeast of Klamath Falls, is one of the substantial residents of the county. Although he has not been in this particular section as long as some of the early pioneers, still Mr. Meyer is to be classed as a leading pioneer of various sections of the country. His life has been filled with adventure and extensive service and all will be interested in an account of the same.

Charles N. Meyer was born on September 4, 1850 in St. Louis, Missouri. Charles W. Meyer, his father, was a native of New York and was in the government employ during the Civil War, giving his attention to buying horses. He had seven brothers who were killed in the service. He was one of the starters and promoters of the Union Stock Yards in St. Louis and his death occurred in that city, in 1868. He had married Mary Shannen, who was born in Mayo county, Ireland and is now deceased. Our subject had one sister, Mrs. James Brennan, who is deceased and one brother, John, a business man in Chicago, both being older than he. After receiving a good education, our subject went to Cheyenne in the fall of 1870 and in the spring of the following year he commenced to clerk for the government. He occupied that position for two years, then as packer for the government, first operating in the Black Hills. After that, he was in the Big Horn country and was on the ground where Custer and his forces were massacred and saw the remains of that terrible conflict. Then he took part in the Rosebud Indian fight and later, returned to Collins in the vicinity of Cheyenne.

Afterwards, he was in the famous Meeker massacre where every pack and train mule was killed. He was among the few survivors and escaped the Indians. Following that, he was ordered to Fort Bridger, where he was promoted to the position of wagon master and was then sent to Salt Lake City. Later, he bought a ranch in Arizona and raised stock some but continued in the employ of the government. When the Spanish-American War broke out, he was ordered to Washington, D. C. and reported to the quartermaster general. He was sent to Savannah, Georgia, then to Tampa, Florida, to break mules to be used in Cuba. Returning to Savannah, he there remained until the stock began to return from Cuba, when he took charge of the same. Later, we find him at the Jefferson barracks, Missouri, and then he was sent to the Philippine islands. He had charge of the pack train known as number thirty-eight and took part in numerous battles. At the battle of Niac, the pack train was cut off but the thirteen packers were enabled to hold their stock although the goods were all pierced with bullets. Next, he was ordered to Manila but being taken sick, was sent back to San Francisco. When able to be out, he was ordered to Portland, reporting to Major Jacobs. Then he was sent to China on the transport Lennox, being in charge of three hundred and seventy cavalry horses and one hundred pack mules. On July 6, 1900, they started on the expedition with the allied forces to suppress the Boxer uprising and rescue the foreigners at Peking. He was in the entire pack service and saw the downfall of Yangtsun, Hosiwu, Tungchow and Peking. Following that, he returned to the United States in the transport Packling, having been gone eleven months. He returned to Portland and received horses there for the government for a short time, then resigned, having been in the employ of the government for twenty-one years. During this long service, he had traveled to various portions of the country and had wide experience in many lines. He finally came to Klamath county and selected the place where he now resides, making settlement in the summer of 1902. Mr. Meyer is exceptionally well pleased with the climate and the resources of this part of the country and expects to make this his permanent home. Being a man of great economy, he was enabled to save during the long service for the government, a nice sum of money, so that now in the later years, he has abundance to make life more pleasant.

In 1884, Mr. Meyer married Jennie Wilson, who died, leaving one son, James. Just as Mr. Meyer quit the service of the government, his son died. On June 1, 1904, Mr. Meyer married Mrs. Charity E. Leafdahl, who has one adopted daughter, Delia. Mr. and Mrs. Meyer are representative people of Klamath county, have a beautiful and pleasant home and have made many warm friends during their residence here.

S. EDWARD MARTIN, a responsible and leading business man of Klamath county, is residing at Merrill. He was born on December 7, 1874, near Otterville, Illinois, the son of Thomas and Thirza (Pattenmore) Martin, both natives of England. They came to the United States in 1872, and dwelt in Illinois. Six years later they journeyed to Phoenix, Oregon, where the father followed his trade of milling. In 1884, they came to Klamath Falls and the father erected the Linkville flour mill which was the first completed in this county. He erected it at first as the burr system but since then the roller process has replaced the former. In partnership with Frank S. Brandon, he erected the roller mills at Merrill. These two places are the only milling establishments in Klamath county and have been instrumental in building up the country. Mr. Martin was among the early pioneers here and has always been a very enterprising and progressive man. Two years since, he retired from the mill business and moved to his large farm in Spring Lake valley, some thirteen miles south of Klamath Falls. Here he gives his attention to stock raising and general farming. He is a member of the A. O. U. W. The brothers and sisters of our subject are Charles J. and Mrs. Elizabeth Ransby, of Klamath Falls, John H., at Merrill, May and Maude at home. Our subject grew up in the various places where his parents lived and received his education from the common schools and at the Medford business college. He thoroughly learned the miller business in all its branches and was associated with his father until the latter retired from business. Mr. Martin owns one-third interest in the mill at Merrill, where he resides, also a third interest in the one at Klamath Falls. His brother, Charles owns a third interest in each plant and the father owns the other third in each one. While our subject handles the one at Merrill, his brother is in charge of the one at Klamath Falls, being an experienced and skillful miller. Our subject has owned his interest in the Klamath Falls mill since 1895 and the Merrill one for four years. In addition to the business mentioned, Mr. Martin in company with his brother Charles has opened a general merchandise establishment in Merrill. This was in June, 1904, and it is now one of the substantial business enterprises of the county. They own a large building and have a fine and complete stock of dry goods, hardware, clothing and gents furnishing, groceries, farm implements and so forth. The mills are each of sixty barrel capacity per day and in addition to what has been mentioned, Mr. Martin has a fine residence and other property.

On May 21, 1899, Mr. Martin married Miss Myrtle B. Ramsby, a native of Oregon. Her parents are Ephraim and Sophia (Woodcock) Ramsby, the former an early pioneer of Oregon and the latter born in Oregon, and both now living at Klamath Falls. To Mr. and Mrs. Martin, two children have been born, Vera and Dorothea E. He is one of the substantial men of Klamath county and is well known all over this part of the country, where he has hosts of friends.

HARRY H. VAN VALKENBURG, an enterprising farmer and stock raiser, resides four miles southwest of Klamath Falls on the Pokenama road. He was born March 4, 1866, at Rockford, Illinois, the son of George VanValkenburg. The latter was a native of Illinois and enjoyed the distinction of a splendid war record serving with the federal forces four years and being wounded five times. Having received a promotion to a first lieutenantcy he was sent home invalided from a wound, and died in 1867. He was a descendant of an old and distinguished Holland family.

The mother of our subject, Josephine (Billick) Van Valkenburg, is also, a native of Illinois, and is now the wife of Ky Taylor, of Klamath Falls. Our subject has one brother, L. G. Van Valkenburg, of Sumas, Washington. After the death of his father, our subject accompanied his mother to Poweshiek county, Iowa, where he was educated in the public schools in that vicinity, and subsequently worked on a farm. It was in 1881 that he removed to the far west, and in 1882 came to Klamath county, remained on the ranch till 1890 then visited Washington and Montana. Returning to Klamath Falls in 1895, he engaged in the jewelry business. In this he continued until the spring of 1904. Soon after his arrival here he studied telegraphy and had a telegraph office in his jewelry store. For a while, also, he had the telephone office in connection with the telegraph system.

Entering the political field in 1898 he was elected county treasurer on the Republican ticket, and was re-elected in 1900, and again in 1902. In the last named election he was the only Republican candidate elected on the ticket which was defeated generally by a majority of one hundred and fifty. This is a political record of which Mr. Van Valkenburg may certainly feel proud. During the spring of 1903 he purchased his present place of one thousand, eight hundred acres, about half of which is farm and hay land, and the other half grazing range. The entire ranch is fenced and provided with a comfortable house and commodious barn. This land lies along the western bank of the Klamath river. It was in July, 1904, that he disposed of his store and removed on to the ranch where he is now profitably engaged in the stock business, and also owns some property in town still.

November 14, 1897, our subject was married to Emma McIlmoil, a native of Marysville, California. She is a daughter of R. H. McIlmoil, one of the early pioneers of the Pacific slope, who came here in 1852. In 1884 he came to Klamath county, but removed to Phoenix, Arizona, in 1900.

Twelve years ago, with practically no means, our subject returned to Klamath county, and worked for one dollar a day on the same ranch that he now owns. He is a member of the A. F. & A. M., and the A. O. U. W., both lodges of Klamath Falls. In the spring of 1904 Mr. Van Valkenburg was a delegate to the state convention at Portland, and is a member of the state Republican central committee.

WILLIAM S. HOAGLAND, who is a farmer and stock raiser, residing some nine miles southeast of Bonanza, has certainly shown himself to be an active builder in the great commonwealth of western United States. He was born on March 6, 1837, in Holmes county, Ohio, the son of Arod and Margaret (Anderson) Hoagland. The father was an early pioneer of Illinois then came in 1844 with his family to Coles county, being among the first settlers there. Later he moved to Moultrie county in the same state and there remained until his death in 1854. Our subject accompanied his parents to Coles county and in that frontier place he was reared and received his education. The schools were very primitive and he had to travel four miles to a little log cabin where his studying was done. He remembers well the days when they traveled fifty miles to mill. On July 7, 1861 in Douglas county, Illinois, he enlisted in Company H, Twenty-fifth Illinois Infantry as regimental wagon master. They were transferred to Missouri immediately and he participated in the battle of Pea Ridge. In 1862 he was at the evacuation of Corinth, Mississippi and then was with General Buell at Louisville, Kentucky. He was at the battle of Crab Orchard and through exposure was paralyzed before but he continued with his command until they got to Crab Orchard and there was discharged on account of disability in October, 1862. In 1864 he was engaged by the government as wagon master for a supply train at Raleigh, Missouri. After this he took up farming, then sold his property and moved to Barber county, Kansas, in 1883. In the spring of 1889 he journeyed west again and came this time to Klamath county and in 1897 he purchased his present place. He has a quarter section of good land, one hundred acres of which are in cultivation. The place is supplied with a good residence, large barn and Mr. Hoagland makes a specialty of raising grain and hay and also handles some cattle. He is a member of the G. A. R. and also of the I. O. O. F. In 1898 he was elected assessor on the Republican ticket and served two years. In December, 1899, Mr. Hoagland married Miss Frances Bear.

A point of early history in his life is of interest and we append the same. In the spring of 1859 he started from Illinois journeying west to Atchison, Kansas. There he joined a freight outfit and went as far as Salt Lake City with them. The train consisted of thirty-one wagons, each of which was supplied with six yoke of oxen. He drove one of the teams but at Ogden, he parted company with the freight outfit and engaged to assist in driving a band of cattle through to California. Later he returned via the Panama route to New York City and back to Illinois. Mr. Hoagland had considerable experience on the frontier and has also shown himself an industrious and substantial man.

HORATIO HILL BURNHAM resides nine miles northwest of Langell postoffice in Langells valley. He owns six hundred and forty acres of land, four hundred acres of which are good for agricultural purposes. The place is utilized for pasture and timber. He has three hundred acres under the plow at this time which annually raises bounteous crops of the cereals and hay. His farm is provided with everything necessary for its successful operation including three fine barns, good house, splendid orchard with bands of stock, as cattle and horses. He has a very fine spring on the place which irrigates his garden and orchard.

Horatio H. Burnham was born in New Brunswick, Canada, on April 1, 1847. His father, Enock B., was a native of the same place and came to Minnesota where he remained until his death. He married Mary H. Hall, also a native of New Brunswick, where, also, her death occurred. The brothers and sisters of our subject are Mrs. Julia Smith, Samuel and Mrs. Mary Wilkenson, all of Minneapolis. Horatio H. is the third of the children. At the age of sixteen, having acquired a good common school education in his home place, he journeyed to Maine, and there learned the tanner's trade. In September, 1868, he sailed from New York city and journeyed via the Isthmus of Panama to San Francisco and went thence to Santa Cruz. In 1870, he went to Butte county, California, and engaged in mining for two years. His next venture was to purchase a sawmill which business employed him until 1889, then he sold his property and came overland with teams to Langells valley, settling on the place he had purchased the winter before. He had one hundred and sixty acres of unimproved land and went to work to build a home and make a fortune. He now has the fine estate mentioned above and is very prosperous.

On November 26, 1885, Mr. Burnham married Sarah Patterson, who was born in Coles county, Illinois, the daughter of John W. and Louisa (Weaver) Patterson, natives of Indiana and Pennsylvania, respectively. Mrs. Burnham has the following named brothers and sisters: Harmon and Samuel, of Oroville, California; Myles, of Durham, California; Thomas, deceased; and Mrs. Lucy Strong, of Paradise, California. Mrs. Burnham came with parents via New York city and the Panama route to San Francisco in 1867. Her father settled in Butte county, California, and is living there now aged seventy-two. Her mother died there on December 9, 1885. To our subject and his wife three children have been born: Ernest Horatio, in Butte county, California, on October 9, 1886; Hall Harrison, January 30, 1894; Hazle Patterson, September 10, 1895.

Mr. Burnham is a member of the A. F. & A. M., having joined that order in 1868, and of the I. O. O. F., while his wife belongs to the Rebekahs.

It is of interest to know that Mr. Burnham started here without any means whatever and has gained his entire property holding through his efforts of thrift and industry. He stands well in the community and is a man who has many warm friends.

JAMES B. MOORE, one of the successful and enterprising stock raisers of Klamath county, residing three miles southwest of Klamath Falls, is a native of Washington. He was born near Walla Walla, March 16, 1862, the son of Joseph Moore. The latter is a native of Muncie, Indiana, who crossed the plains in 1850 and located in Washington territory, near Walla Walla, where he engaged in general farming and stock raising. Twenty-two years ago he came to Klamath county where he continued to make his home until recently. He has just removed to Fresno, California, where he expects to make his permanent home. He is about seventy-six years of age, a devoted member of the M. E. church, in which he does church work in the line of preaching. The mother of our subject was Elizabeth E. (Morris) Moore, a native of Tennessee. She died in 1902 at the age of seventy-five years, a devoted and consistent member of the M. E. church, a noble woman and one without enemies.

The brothers and sisters of our subject are Joseph M., of Klamath county; William E., Madera county, California; Lydia A., of Madera county; Mrs. Martha F. Sigler, Klamath Falls; Mrs. Alice Norton, Woodland, California.

In 1868, at the age of six years, our subject accompanied his parents to Davisville, Sacramento county, California, remaining there one year, subsequently removing to Lake county, in the same state. A few years afterward the family located in Yolo county. Having passed several years in the public schools of California our subject went to Mendocino county and in 1883 came to Oregon and located in Klamath county. He secured a homestead in Poe valley, made a number of trips to California, and lived at Red Bluffs four years. Two years ago he located permanently on his present ranch of nine hundred acres, where he is profitably engaged in stock-raising. Two hundred and fifty acres of this land are under cultivation, the ranch is all fenced, he has a good house, barn, and all necessary farming implements. His stock consists of cattle and horses of which he has a fine band.

January 1, 1899, our subject was married to Nettie F. Lewis, daughter of Leon and Mary Lewis. To them have been born three children, Nellie L., James M. and Lola E. Mr. Moore came to Klamath county with only a horse and cart, and was compelled to work for wages among the neighboring ranches. During three and one-half years he drove a team for the late Judge G. W. Smith. He was one of the early settlers of Klamath county, endured many vicissitudes and hardships, but today he is recognized as one of the successful and enterprising business men of the locality in which he resides.

FRANK H. McCORNACK residing five miles northwest of Klamath Falls, is in partnership with his brother, Eugene P. McCornack, and together they own one of the best bands of stock in the vicinity. Our subject was born January 31, 1869, near Eugene, Oregon. His father, Alexander McCornack, was a native of Scotland who came to the United States when quite young, settling first in Illinois. In 1852 he crossed the plains with ox teams extending his journey through to Puget sound. A short time afterward he came to Lane county, Oregon, and located on a donation claim. One of the earliest pioneers of Lane county, he enlisted as a volunteer in the memorable Modoc War, and soon afterward was killed by a runaway team. This sad accident occurred near his home, in Lane county.

The mother of our subject was Maria (Eakin) McCornack, a native of Ireland. She came to Illinois where she was married and crossed the plains with her husband, dying in 1902. Our subject is the youngest of a family of twelve children, all of whom are living with the exception of the oldest. Reared on the Lane county ranch, he was educated in the public schools in his vicinity, and, also, attended the state university, at Eugene, and the business college at Salem, Oregon. He removed to his present location in 1891, where he at once engaged in the stock business. The same year, December 25, he was united in marriage to Rosa Wolf, who was born in the Willamette valley. Her parents were among the earliest pioneers of Oregon, her father now living near Falls City, Oregon. Her mother is dead. Eugene F., Mary E. and Agnes M. are the three children of Mr. and Mrs. McCornack.

The extensive ranch owned by the McCornack Brothers comprise nearly twelve thousand acres, mainly hay, swamp and grazing land. They are engaged in raising cattle, sheep, and horses, and have quite a considerable herd of stock, principally cattle and sheep. Our subject has witnessed many of the vicissitudes of life, and endured many of life's hardships. At one period, he worked on ranches for others where the remuneration did not rise to over fifty cents per day. And this experience ran through a number of well remembered years. He came to the community in which he now resides, with very limited means, and his unqualified success is due to the sterling qualities of industry, energy and superior natural business ability.

Mr. and Mrs. McCornack are members of the Presbyterian church. Politically, he is a Republican, a progressive citizen and highly esteemed by all with whom he has business or social relations.

LUCIEN B. APPLGATE is well known in Klamath county. His residence, one of the finest in the county, is eight miles northeast of Klamath Falls in the Swan Lake valley. There Mr. Applegate has a magnificent estate of five thousand acres, a considerable portion of which produces alfalfa, timothy and grain. He has commodious out buildings, besides a large ten room two story residence, well supplied with all modern conveniences. Mr. Applegate gives his attention to farming and stock raising and has prospered very much in these endeavors. Each winter he takes his family to California, both for the purpose of improving his life and giving his children first class educational facilities.

Lucien B. Applegate was born in St. Clair county, Missouri on April 24, 1842, the son of Lindsay and Elizabeth (Miller) Applegate. These worthy pioneers joined the first emigrant train that ever wended its way through the wilds to the Pacific coast, it being led by Marcus Whitman and made that journey with their infant son, in 1843. Whitman has often been credited with bringing the first train of emigrants across the plains to the Pacific coast, but he followed the train which Mr. Applegate was conducting, overtaking them when they were nearly through.

After that he rendered valuable assistance in furthering the emigrants of the Applegate train and those with him. Fremont, also, followed the Applegate trail until overtaking them. The first ones had a very hard time as they were called on to clear much of the way in hard places. Settlement was made in the Willamette valley where our subject was reared. Owing to the fact that school facilities were very limited he was obliged to study at home under the instruction of his father. In those primitive days, the light for the student was the flickering glare of the fireplace and the dim blaze of the wick lying in a vessel of oil, and despite all these drawbacks, he received a good education, as did also the other brothers of the family. His father owned a toll road across the mountains from Oregon to California and at one time owned a large portion of the land where Ashland is now situated. Our subject was engaged in the mercantile business when he arrived at manhood's estate and was also interested in the woolen mills. He came with his father to help locate the Klamath agency. After that, he was superintendent of farming there and in 1869, located in Swan Lake valley. The valley received its name from the fact that numbers of these noble birds were found on the lake. He engaged in stock business and this has been his home ever since. His means were very limited when he started and so well has he conserved the resources to be found that he is now one of the wealthy men of this part of the state.

On June 7, 1866, Mr. Applegate married Miss Margaret E. Grubb, who was born in Iowa and crossed the plains with her parents in 1852. Her father and mother, Samuel and Elizabeth Grubb, were early pioneers from Iowa to the Rogue river valley. To our subject and his wife six children were born, named below: Elmer Ivan, married to Esther Ogden, who was a special student in botany in Stanford University and was for two years professional botanist in the employ of the government covering the country from California to Washington but is now secretary of the Klamath Water Users Association in the government irrigation project; Minnie A., wife of C. C. Chetwood, of Klamath Falls, and she is well educated and a talented artist; Fred L. married to Myra VanBrunner; Evelyn R., a graduate of the conservatory of music in San Jose, California; Bessie B., a student at Stanford; and Elsie T., studying music in San Jose.

Mr. Applegate is a member of the A. F. & A. M. and the A. O. U. W. He is a man who receives the esteem and respect of all who know him and he has so wrought that his efforts have resulted in much good besides the accumulation of his fine fortune.

Upon the outbreak of the Rebellion, Mr. Applegate was commissioned by Governor Gibbs, major of the Oregon volunteers. Mr. Applegate has always taken an active part in politics, but never would accept office for himself.

JOHN I. DONNELL, a farmer and stock raiser residing fourteen miles northwest from Bonanza near the head of Alkali valley, was born on January 15, 1844, in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania. His father, Moses D., was also a native of the same county and followed blacksmithing. He remained there until his death in 1862, being then sixty-two years of age. He had married Miss Sockman who was also born in that county. She died in 1866, aged sixty-two. Our subject was the youngest child in the family, the others being named as follows: Mrs. Margaret Neville, of Dayton, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Susan Gormin of Burr Oak, Kansas; Charlotte, deceased; William, who served in the Civil War and is now deceased; Thomas, of Madison county, Arkansas, who served three years in the Civil War. Our subject grew up in his native county and in addition to receiving a good education from the common schools, learned the blacksmith trade from his father. In September, 1861, he enlisted for three years in the Union Army being in Company C, Fourth Pennsylvania Cavalry. He was transferred from Harrisburg, Pennsylvania to Washington, D. C., then was sent to the Army of the Potomac under General George B. McClelland. His first fight was in the Seven Day Battle of Richmond, then he was at Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, after which he participated in the awful struggle at Gettysburg. He was in the battle of the wilderness, of Spottsylvania and took part in the struggle of Petersburg. He was in much other fighting and in all was in fifty-two battles. He was in constant service and although in the hottest of the fights where scores of men were shot down around him, he never received a wound. His clothing was frequently pierced by bullets and he was, as it would seem, at the very cannon's mouth, but providence decreed that he should escape uninjured. He had two horses shot down under him and he was in many, many trying places. He never was in the hospital and although sometimes sick, he never was so disabled but that he always reported for duty. The result was that Mr. Donnell experienced a terrible and trying time, during the years of his military career. His cup of hardship and arduous service was filled to the brim but he showed himself a staunch and capable man and a brave soldier, whose actions in defense of his country, gained him a higher command. After being mustered out, he returned to his home in Pennsylvania then traveled around for several years and finally, in 1870, located in Jewel county, Kansas, where he engaged at his trade. In 1883, he came to Ogden with wagon train, whence he journeyed by cars to San Francisco and shipped to Coos Bay, Oregon. He worked at his trade for the Coos Bay Coal Company until the fall of 1885, when he came to Dairy, in the Alkali valley. He operated a shop for a time there, then sold out and opened a general merchandise store. After this, he was appointed postmaster which place he held for about twelve years. Then he removed to his ranch and engaged in farming and stock raising. He owns one hundred and sixty acres of land and raises mostly hay for his stock. He has a fine barn, residence and other improvements while his place is especially well provided with water. Mr. Donnell is a member of the A. O. U. W.

On March 31, 1871, Mr. Donnell married Harriet B. Harrell, born in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, and was living in Ralls county, Missouri, at the time of her marriage. She died on May 22, 1902. Seven children have been born to this union, three of whom died in Kansas. The others the Blanch, the wife of Loren Bailey, of Lakeview, Oregon; John H., Myrtle L., and Cora M.

Mr. Donnell is a reliable and substantial man and is one of the good citizens of Klamath county. Since the above was written Mr. Donnell died at his home near Dairy, January 11, 1905, and was buried at Bonanza cemetery.

HON. ORSON AVERY STEARNS, the pioneer settler of Klamath county, is of long and honorable record and a descendant of one of the most distinguished families in the United States. At present he is engaged in general farming and dairying, and resides seven miles west of Klamath Falls. He is a native of Winnebago county, Illinois, born January 9, 1843. His father, David E. Stearns, a son of Vermont, was born February 11, 1808, and subsequently became one of the earliest settlers of Winnebago county, going there in 1835 and casting his lot with the ancient tribe of Winnebago Indians, that is, residing in a locality entirely surrounded by them. By trade the elder Stearns was a carpenter, and built some of the larger buildings in Buffalo, New York. In Winnebago county he secured land upon which he resided until 1853, when the stirring times on the Pacific coast attracted his attention and he made the perilous trip across the great plains, accompanied by his family, a wife and five children. Six months and four days from their departure they arrived in the Rogue River valley. He secured a donation claim, and then found himself with but limited means at his command. Potatoes were selling at twenty-five cents per pound, and flour at thirty-three dollars per hundred pounds. Here the elder Stearns traded a two-horse wagon for one hundred hills of potatoes—and dug them himself. He was accompanied across the plains by three brothers and two sisters, Myron N., Samuel E., Avery P., Mrs. Velina A. Williams and Mrs. Charlotte E. Pengra. With the exception of Mrs. Pengra they all settled in the Rogue River valley. With her husband, Byron Pengra, she located near Eugene, Oregon. He was one of the founders of the town of Springfield, Oregon. With the exception of the two sisters the family is now deceased. David E. Stearns died in 1878.

The paternal grandfather of our subject, John Stearns, born at Monkton, Vermont, April 14, 1778, accompanied his son, David E., across the plains. At the advanced age of ninety-two years he passed away in the Rogue River valley in May, 1870. The mother of David E. Stearns, died in Vermont at the age of one hundred years, and his grandmother died in Winnebago county, Illinois, June 9, 1852. A great-grandfather of our subject, Ebenezer Stearns, was a native of New Hampshire, and was captured by the Tories during the Revolutionary war. A genealogy of the Stearns family has been published in two volumes, and it contains more than eighteen thousand names, all descendants from three brothers who came from England to America on the ship Arabella, in 1630. They settled in Watertown, Massachusetts.

Our subject had five brothers and sisters, viz: Oscar L., deceased, Newell D., deceased, Mrs. Armina Purves, of Rogue River valley, George A., deceased and Emily M., deceased. In 1864 our subject enlisted in Company I, First Oregon Infantry, his being the first name on the company roster.

He saw service in Oregon, and was stationed at Fort Klamath, but was in various parts of the state at different times. Some comrades in his company discovered what is now called "Crater Lake." Our subject named this body of water Majestic Lake, and by that name it was recognized two years. It was later renamed Crater Lake by James Sutton, editor of the Oregon Sentinel, who published the account of a discovery of a crater on an island in the lake. In July 1867, he was mustered out, being a member of one of the last companies to be discharged after the war. The present townsite of Linkville, or Klamath Falls, was the first location in the county. Two weeks subsequently our subject secured his place, and a man named O. T. Brown took the third place, on Spencer creek. For thirty-seven years Mr. Stearns has made his home in one place in Klamath county. He participated in the Modoc war.

In Sacramento, California, May 17, 1873 our subject was married to Margaret J. Riggs, born in Ray county, Missouri. The wife died May 17, 1895, on the twenty-second anniversary of their wedding. To them were born three children, Leslie Orrin, Blanche Alice, wife of George Ager, and Eva May, wife of Theodore Bryant. January 10, 1897, our subject was again married, his bride being Luella M. Sherman, daughter of Salsbury Sherman, a second cousin of William Tecumseh Sherman, the distinguished union general. They have one child, E. Orson Everett Stearns, born September 1, 1898. Our subject was the first justice of the peace in Klamath county, and in 1880 was elected representative on the Republican ticket.

CHARLES D. WILLSON, a merchant in Klamath Falls, was born on November 6, 1862, in Clinton, Iowa. His father William N. Willson, was born in the state of New York and came with his father, Daniel Willson, the grandfather of our subject, to where Clinton county, Iowa, now is. He was one of the first settlers there. Daniel Willson later lived in Root county and followed his profession, that of physician, there for many years. He was a member of the last territorial legislature and the first state legislature of that state. Mr. William Willson married Miss Sarah Tupper, the mother of our subject. She was born in Sheboygan, Michigan. Charles D. has one sister, Mrs. Ballard, of Klamath Falls. Our subject left home when a boy and was engaged at various occupations, and in 1883 came to Cassia county, Idaho where on July 12, of the same year he married May D. Alley. They were the first couple married in Cassia county and came thence to Columbia county, Oregon, where his parents were. Mrs. Willson, the mother of our subject, died there and her husband is now living in Klamath Falls, one of the prosperous and wealthy men here. In 1888, Mr. Willson came to Klamath county. He first engaged in the stock business, afterward he moved to town and took up the grocery business in the spring of 1890. He was not very successful at the start but has since become to be one of the wealthy men of Klamath Falls and is doing an extensive business. He is a member of the Elks in Portland, and the Foresters in Klamath Falls. When he landed in this county, he had very limited means but at the present time, he owns much valuable business property in Klamath Falls, has a fine two story, ten room residence and several hundred acres of choice timber land. Mrs. Willson was born in Phelps county, Missouri. Her father, Leonard B. Ally, was a wealthy citizen of that county and later moved to Oregon where he remained until his death. He married Miss Lou Love who is now living in Portland. To Mr. and Mrs. Willson, three children have been born, Thomas, deceased, Della and Arthur.

LOUIS HESSIG is a well known merchant at Fort Klamath where he has a fine business establishment and is favored by a good trade. He was born on June 27, 1843, in Galena, Illinois. His father, Jacob Hessig, a native of Switzerland, came to Illinois in early days and was a pioneer miner at Galena. He was also one of the first copper miners of the copper district and in 1849, crossed the plains with ox teams. He met with much opposition from the Indians and had a hard trip, twelve of the party being killed by the savages. Being one of the earliest pioneers to the Golden State, he assisted to hew many of the first trails through the country. His trade was carpentering and he followed that in various mining mills and erected a quartz mill at French Gulch, where he was interested. He was in most of the leading camps of the state and continued in the business until his death in 1862, which occurred in Shasta county. He was buried by the Royal Arch Masons. He had been a good and upright man and had many friends, during his life. He had married Miss Rosa Versell, a native of Switzerland. After his death she married Mr. Francis and is now living with one of her grandchildren in Edgewood, California, aged eighty-four. She has one brother, Joseph Versell, who is a pioneer of Rock Island county, Illinois, and served as assessor of his county for twenty-two years. He is now ninety-five years of age, hale and hearty. Our subject is the oldest of three children. His brother John, who was a promising young man, was slain by the Indians in 1864, while mining at Hay Fork, Trinity county, California. He was then aged nineteen years. Mary, the sister of our subject, is now deceased. She was the wife of Dave Gibson, who was one of the forty-niners of California and the first man in the Humboldt country. He got there about 1850 and remained until 1885, the time of his death. He was there when the Laura Virginia came into port, the first ship that ever entered Humboldt bay. Mr. Gibson was conducting the first pack train into that country and one day when out of camp was shot by the Indians, one ball entering his body and an arrow his groin. As he came staggering back to the camp, he was mistaken for an Indian and his friends shot him with a charge of buckshot. However, he survived it all and lived until 1885. It is interesting to note that while handling this pack train, one of the hands, an old sailor, expressed himself as not understanding why they unshipped their cargo every night. Our subject came via the Panama route in 1854 to San Francisco, arriving there on April 2. They immediately went to French Gulch to join his father, but later went to Weaversville, where he attended school. After that, he followed packing for years in Humboldt county, then was engaged in the general merchandise business with his brother-in-law, David Gibson, for fourteen years. After that period, he went to Siskiyou county and took up stock raising. During all these years, Mr. Hessig was well acquainted with pioneer life, being out in the camps in snow and storm and enduring all sorts of hardships while he performed his arduous labor. He also showed the true frontiersman spirit and overcame many obstacles that seemed unsurmountable. Finally, in 1900, he came to Fort Klamath and opened a merchandise establishment. He now has a nice store, a good residence, and enjoys a liberal patronage. He still owns a stock ranch in Siskiyou county, California besides other property.

Fraternally, he is affiliated with the A. F. & A. M., having joined in 1876.

On May 1, 1872, Mr. Hessig married Miss Charlotte Keer, a native of Denmark. After seventeen years of happy life, Mrs. Hessig was called to the world beyond, leaving a devoted husband, three sons and a daughter. She was a member of the Eastern Star and was a lady beloved by all. The children are Harry, Herbert, John Humboldt, Joseph and Mrs. Salmona Josephine Farewell, of San Francisco. The two youngest boys are graduates of Heald's business college, of San Francisco.

In 1895, Mr. Hessig contracted a second marriage, Mrs. Mary Bridget Francis Butler becoming his wife at that time. They are both highly respected people and have won the confidence of all.

Mr. Hessig is the daughter of Patrick and Elizabeth (McCormic) Sullivan, natives of Ireland. They migrated to the United States in 1844 and made settlement in Vermont, where this laughter was born. Later they removed to Burnham, Maine, where they reside at this time.

ALFORD MELHASE, residing about four miles southwest of Fort Klamath, Klamath county, Oregon, is one of the most extensive and prosperous ranchers in that vicinity. He was born June 7, 1858, in Prussia, Germany. He is of a family of seven children, viz: Fred, our subject, Richard, Gustave, Emma, Clara and Bertha, deceased.

When ten years of age our subject came from Germany with his parents, sailing from Hamburg and landing in New York city. This was in 1868, soon after the close of the Civil War. From the metropolis of the Empire state the family removed to Hannibal, Missouri. There still residing with his parents, he grew to manhood. In 1889, at the age of thirty-one years, Mr. Melhase removed to Oregon, locating first at Klamath Falls, where he resided two years. At the close of that period he came to the vicinity where he now resides and, in a small way, engaged in the stock business. He confesses that he experienced periods of ill fortune, and "went broke" a couple of times. But in 1896 the clouds broke, exhibited a silver lining, and since then he has accomplished a great deal in the way of acquiring a competence. In that year he purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land, to which he subsequently added until he now has seven hundred and twenty acres, all natural meadow land and well adapted to the grazing of sheep which is his principal industry. Mr. Melhase also owns seven hundred and sixty acres in another tract which is mainly hay and swamp land. He also has a half section near Klamath Falls. On his original homestead he has a fine seven room house, two large barns, supplied with all the conveniences necessary for successful sheep growing, and he is, in short, one of the most substantial sheep growers. And all this prosperity has come to him since 1896—a trifle over eight brief years. He has a large band of sheep and quite a number of cattle and horses.

June 13, 1881, Mr. Melhase was married to Dora Brummer, a native of Cincinnati, Ohio. She was reared at Hannibal, Missouri, where her parents are both living. Mrs. Melhase has one sister, Mary, wife of Richard Melhase, brother of our subject. Six children have been born to our subject and his estimable wife, viz: John, Delia, Emma, William, Edna, and Daniel W.

Our subject is a member of the A. O. U. W. of Klamath Falls. He is one of the pioneers of the community in which he resides, and this was not his first experience in the west, as, in 1875, he went with his parents to Humboldt, California, where they lived three years, returning to Hannibal. He is enterprising, broad minded and progressive, and takes a lively interest in educational work. His father died a few years since; his mother is still living.

HON. JOHN SAMUEL SHOOK is one of the first settlers within the precincts of Klamath county. His residence is one and one-half miles south of Dairy and he was born on February 26, 1847, in Ripley county, Indiana. His father, Amon Shook, was also a native of Indiana. John Shook Sr., the father of Amon, came from Baltimore, Maryland to Indiana, settling in the Miami bottoms in early days. There he lived until aged eighty-four, the time of his death. Our subject's father came on to Iowa in early days and in 1864 crossed the plains to Jackson county, Oregon. In 1869 he located in Klamath county and remained there until his death in 1903, he being then eighty-seven years of age. He had married Catharine Yost, who was born in Jennings county, Indiana. Her father was born in Germany. Her grandfather on her mother's side, Samuel Glasgow, was born in Pennsylvania and lived to be one hundred years of age. He came from Scotch ancestry. Mrs. Shook is still living, her home being that of our subject and her age eighty-three. Her children are Mrs. Mary J. Sutton, near Dairy; Mrs. Hattie Parker, of Los Angeles, California; Mrs. Fannie Schumann, of Guatemala, Central America; Mrs. Ada Rueck, near Dairy; John S., who is our subject; Isaac N., of Ashland, Oregon; David P., a partner of our subject; and William H., of Klamath county. Mr. Shook came with his parents to Davis county, Iowa, when a child. Schooling facilities were very limited but he was determined to have an education so spent his evenings studying before the hickory bark fire of the old fashioned fireplace. At the age of fifteen, it being in the spring of 1862, he left home and took up the weary journey across the plains with a large emigrant train of ox teams. At American Falls on the Snake river, they were attacked by Indians and ten of their party were killed while fourteen were wounded. Coming on, he landed in Susanville, California, where our young traveler worked for fifteen dollars per month for the first winter. During the evenings he kept up his studies and the next year he followed teaming in Virginia City. In the fall of 1863, Mr. Shook walked from Virginia City to Susanville and used all the money he had to start a store with. In the fall of the next year, he sold out and went to where his parents had located in Phoenix, Oregon, they crossed the plains in 1864. In the spring of 1869, he started out to find a first class stock location and lighted on Yonna valley, in what is now Klamath county. Such excellent grass, fine water and other favorable things as were evident there induced him to locate and he succeeded in getting his people to come there too. They bought a few head of stock and went into business. Very few people were in the country then and much danger was experienced from hostile Indians. During the Modoc War, Mr. Shook enlisted as scout in Company B, Oregon State Militia and was chosen sergeant. He did excellent service, was in many trying and dangerous places, assisted to quell the savages and when the war was ended returned to his ranch. Later he located a sawmill at the Big Springs, which he afterward called Bonanza where Bonanza is now located and furnished the lumber to build the first school house in Bonanza. After completing it, he taught the first term of school there then later he dropped the lumber industry and turned his attention exclusively to stock raising, being in partnership with his brothers, Isaac N. and David P. In 1887, Isaac N. Shook sold his interests and the firm has been confined to the two brothers since. They are known among the leading stockmen of this part of Oregon and have bands of cattle and horses besides three thousand acres of land, two thousand acres of which are mostly meadow. At one time, the Shook brothers had about two thousand head of cattle on the range, besides a great many horses and mules. They have been very prosperous in their business and now their extensive meadows, dotted with great hay stacks, their fine bands of well bred cattle and horses, and their other property proclaim them leading and substantial men. In addition to the dangers from Indians they experienced considerable trouble with cattle and horse thieves, but were instrumental in putting the latter entirely out of business. In the spring of 1904, Mr. Shook was elected to represent the twenty-first district of Oregon in the state legislature, being joint representative of Klamath, Lake, Crook and Grant counties. He is a man of experience, of ability and force, and will, without doubt, conserve carefully the interests of his constituents. Mr. Shook is a member of the state stock association of Klamath county and was delegate to the national live stock association at Portland in January, 1904. He was also a delegate to the Republican state convention in April, 1904. Mr. Shook has always shown a marked interest in getting the country settled up and developed and in making it prosperous. He has done a lion's share in this noble endeavor and is to be commended for his generosity and progressiveness. He was a charter member of the Klamath Falls lodge, I. O. O. F. and also a charter member of the Bonanza lodge when it was organized. Being a pioneer, he has endured much hardship, performing a great deal of trying and arduous labor, but despite it all, he is a man well preserved, vigorous, forceful and has the confidence and esteem of all the people.

On April 20, 1904, Mr. Shook married Cora (Jones) Blake, who was born at Cedarville, Ohio. In addition to their stock business, the Shook brothers have taken great pains to show what the country will produce and they have orchards in which some of the trees are over twenty years of age and in the fall of each year, these magnificent trees bend to the earth with their great wealth of luscious fruit. They have fine vegetables and produce some of the choicest to be found in the country. Altogether they are known as thrifty, progressive and substantial men.

EUGENE R. HANAN resides four miles west of Fort Klamath and is one of the leading stock raisers of Klamath county. He was born on January 10, 1857 in Douglas county, Oregon. George Hanan, his father, was born in Ireland and came to New York with his parents in 1844. They crossed the plains with ox teams in the second train that ever made the trip. They landed in Oregon City and he there followed shoemaking. Afterward, he came to Garden valley on the Umpqua in Douglas county and secured a donation claim. That was his home until his death in 1876, being then aged sixty-five years. He was a very active and progressive man and did very much to open and build up this thriving country. He served as treasurer of Douglas county and was a leading man there. He married Miss Eliza Evans, a native of New York city. The wedding occurred in that city and she accompanied her husband across the plains. She is now living at Lewiston, Idaho, aged eighty-one. Our subject grew up on a farm in Douglas county and received his education from the early schools. He continued on the farm until eighteen years of age and then took up stock raising. He has handled both cattle and sheep and at the present time is raising cattle almost exclusively.

On October 14, 1875, Mr. Hanan married Miss Harriet C. Gilliland, a native of Putnam county, Illinois. Alexander B. Gilliland, her father, was born in Brown county, Ohio, of Scotch ancestry. He married Mary T. Willis and in the spring of 1853, with a family of three children they started across the plains to Oregon. Mrs. Hanan was then four years old. It took them nine months to reach Douglas county and the trip was arduous and trying. Mr. Gilliland took a donation claim and was one of the sturdy pioneers to build up that county. A few years before his death, which occurred in 1884, he retired from the farm to Roseburg. He was aged sixty-four at the time of his departure. The mother died in 1896. In 1901, Mr. Hanan brought all his cattle from west of the Cascades to Klamath county. He has an estate of one thousand three hundred and twenty acres, where he now lives, which produces abundance of hay for his large herds. He has over four hundred head of cattle with horses enough to handle the enterprise.

Mr. Hanan is a member of the A. O. U. W. lodge and is a progressive and good man. They have four children, George Mar, Ariel, deceased; Myrtle and Wren. Mr. Hanan is the fifth in his family and his brothers and sisters are named as follows: John C., William J. and Henry, deceased; Mrs. Ella, widow of A. C. Marks; Jefferson D., deceased; Mrs. Belle Fenton; and Richard E. Mrs. Hanan's brothers and sisters are Lyle W., Mrs. Margaret Smith, Cyrus B., Robert O. and Cassius C. deceased; Inez, the wife of T. B. Foster and Lillie, the wife of John Jamison, both of Portland. Mr. Foster is with the First National Bank there. Mrs. Hanan was the second child of her father's family.

Mr. and Mrs. Emery are substantial people, have won the confidence of all who know them, and have done much to build up and advance the interests of the county.

DANIEL B. NICHOLS, who resides some three miles southwest of Bonanza, and devotes himself to stock raising and farming, was born on February 16, 1852, in Linn county, Iowa. John Nichols was his father, and he was born in Indiana and came as an early pioneer to Linn county, Iowa, and to Shasta county, California. About 1879 he settled in Poe valley and there remained until his death in 1902, being then aged seventy-six. His father, James Nichols, who is the grandfather of our subject, was born in Virginia in 1798. He lived on the frontier all his life, split rails where Indianapolis, Indiana, now stands and died in the vicinity of Bonanza in 1900, being one hundred and one years and eight months of age. His trade was that of the millwright and he was a sturdy pioneer and substantial man. Our subject's mother was Anna (Lewis) Nichols, a native of Indiana. She came with her parents to Iowa in early days and is now living near Bonanza, aged seventy-two. She is the mother of nine children and the only one of the family who is deceased is the father, mentioned above. The children are Daniel B., who is our subject; Simeon L., of Leavenworth county, Kansas; Mrs. Eliza E. Wise, of Lake county, Oregon; Benjamin F. and John A., near Bonanza; Mrs. Malinda, of Merrill; Mrs. Alice Parker, of Josephine county; A. Abram of Almira, Washington; and Norman, of Bonanza. For fifty years no death occurred in the family, so far as is known, it being a most remarkable record. Our subject went with his parents from Linn to Fayette county, Iowa, when a child and when sixteen went with them to Douglas county, Maine. There, on January 1, 1874, he married Julia A. Warren, a native of Missouri. In the fall of that year, he came to Shasta county, California, and followed teaming in the mines, returning the next year to Kansas. In 1877 he came back to Shasta county and in September, 1879, came to Poe valley. He selected a place and since has remained here, engaged in stock raising and farming, with the exception of a short time spent in Crook county. The country was very new and wild when he came and his finances were soon depleted and having his family to support met with much hardship. In 1882 Mr. Nichols was called to mourn the death of his wife, who left two children, Edwin D. and Bertha, wife of Hugh Clopton, at Bonanza. On September 21, 1904, Mr. Nichols married Miss Mildred J. Frazier, who was born in Harrison county, Iowa. The daughter of Daniel R. and Matilda (Inther) Frazier, the former living in Douglas county, Washington, and the latter deceased. Mrs. Nichols has one brother, Kenneth E., of Douglas county, Washington. Mr. Nichols has a good farm, half of which is in cultivation and a fine band of well bred horses and mules. He is a charter member and past grand of the Bonanza Lodge, of the I. O. O. F., and also belongs to the Rebekahs.

JEFFERSON KIRKPATRICK is operating a hotel, feed store and butcher shop at Fort Klamath and in company with G. S. Hoyt also conducts a general merchandise establishment. He was born on July 27, 1859, in Uba county, California. His father, John Kirkpatrick, crossed the plains with ox teams in 1847 to Oregon, where he was engaged in mining for a number of years. Then he settled in Uba county and took up the stock business. He made several trips across the plains to the west, has traveled over a large portion of California and is one of the old timers. He was a volunteer in the Modoc Indian War and at the time of the Cayuse War in 1847, he enlisted at Vancouver and was discharged honorably at Fort Walla Walla, after having participated in the heat of the struggle. He was in the mining excitement in California in 1849 and operated one of the first pack trains in the state. Finally in 1884, he came to this county and engaged in the stock business. After that, he sold out and is now retired, being eighty-seven years of age. His father, the grandfather of our subject, died recently in Illinois at the age of one hundred and four years. The mother of Jefferson was Rebecca (Coplantz) Kirkpatrick. She came west when young and died in June, 1900, at the age of seventy-eight. There were ten children in the family of whom the following named are living, our subject, who is the oldest, Esther A. Steele, Charles, Algernon, Angress, Orlando and Willis. Our subject accompanied his parents twice on trips to the west and spent most of his younger days on a stock farm in California and this state. He was educated in the public schools and in 1882, came to Klamath county. He entered a pre-emption claim near Fort Klamath and was among the first settlers in this vicinity. He took up stock raising, and conducted the same until 1903, when he sold his ranch and entered the feed business in Klamath Falls. He purchased property here and is doing a nice business in the lines mentioned. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the A. O. U. W. and is a man of good standing.

On September 24, 1883, Mr. Kirkpatrick married Miss Alfaretta Pearsons, who was born in Ottumwa, Iowa. Her father, Jerry Pearsons, died when she was small. Her mother, Eliza (Watkins) Pearsons, is now Mrs. Gray and dwells in this county. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Kirkpatrick, Maude Ray, on May 20, 1900.

DR. JOHN ALEXANDER CHASTAIN, who is now living a retired life in Bonanza, was born on April 3, 1834, the old home place being situated one mile above Blythe ferry at the mouth of the Hiawasse river in Meigs county, Tennessee. His father, William Chastain, was born in Simpson county, Kentucky, on February 11, 1809. When twelve years of age, he accompanied his father, Rev. Joseph Chastain, to Meigs county, Tennessee. Joseph Chastain, who was the grandfather of our subject, was a noted Baptist preacher, the son of John Chastain, one of the French Huguenots who came over from France on account of religious persecution and settled in South Carolina. He preached for the Baptist church also and was known as the nine shilling bell man, owing to the fact that his powerful voice could be heard as far as the nine shilling bell. He was well known all over North and South Carolina, Georgia and adjacent states. Joseph Chastain was with General Jackson in the War of 1812. Our subject's father grew up in Meigs county, Tennessee and there married Miss Mary Ann Frie, the third daughter of John and Abigail Frie. She was born in Blunt county, Alabama and came with her parents to Meigs county, Tennessee when thirteen years of age. In 1837, William Chastain enlisted in Captain Vernon's Company, United States Volunteers for the purpose of gathering the Cherokee Indians and placing them on the territory reserved for them in the Cherokee Nation. It was then that the Hiawasse purchase was made. He was mustered out of service in July, 1838. In October of the same year, he moved to Lawrence county, Missouri, twenty miles west of Springfield, which was then a mere hamlet of four or five houses, and farmed there for sixteen years. Then he sold and moved to Howell county. When the war broke out, he enlisted in the confederate army in General McBride's brigade, under Price but afterward was transferred to Marmaduke's brigade. At the breaking out of the war he had much property but it was all destroyed or confiscated. Later, his family moved to Oregon county, Missouri where he died on January 24, 1866 in his fifty-ninth year. The mother died in 1879, in Arkansas in her sixty-sixth year. They were the parents of six children, three of whom are living, Joseph and Elizabeth, both of Baxter county, Arkansas, and our subject. He grew up with his parents but his schooling facilities were meager. He studied by the open fire place and by the light of the old dip candle at home so thoroughly that when twenty years of age he secured a certificate to teach school. His first term was taught in Jasper county, Missouri. He also taught in various other places and engaged then in buying horses and mules to take to Louisiana. While teaching, he studied medicine and in 1856, went to Yell county, Arkansas and studied under the noted Dr. Ward. Then he drove a team west and later returned to the lead mines of Missouri where he dealt in mining property successfully. After this, he was salesman in a store, bought an interest in the same but owing to a lawsuit, lost all. Then again he turned to medicine, studying under Dr. James, in Granby, Newton county. He handled a drug store in Jasper county, then sold out and went to Neosho river, Cherokee Nation, where he took up the practice of his profession. Returning to Jasper county, he was appointed deputy sheriff and took the census of that division in 1860. On March 3, 1861, the day before Lincoln's inauguration, he married Miss Sarah T. Boyd. On August 29, 1862, a son was born to them and the mother died the following morning. The child is William Chastain, now a farmer in Douglas county, Oregon. On November 29, 1862, the doctor left his boy with an aunt and organized a company of men for the confederate army. He was clerk of the brigade in the commissary department under General Shelby and in the fall of 1863, he went into the ranks, being appointed regimental quartermaster. Resigning from this, he was recruiting officer and gathered a company of seventy-four. In August, 1864, he was elected captain of Company C, in Colonel J. T. Caffrey's regiment. This company was left at Bateville on provost duty and part of that year he was detailed as recruiting corporal. In the fall of 1864, he was appointed on a special duty to make a map of the country preparatory to making a raid that was planned. His work was so favorably received that he was recommended to Richmond to be appointed as inspector general of Fagan's cavalry, of the trans-Mississippi department. The commission was issued but owing to the close of the war, it was never received. On June 8, 1865 he was paroled at Shrevesport then went to Baton Rouge and at Balls Bluff bade his company farewell. Among other things, the doctor stated that he was forced into the war and he made as good a soldier of himself as he knew how. Now he proposed to return to private life and make as good a citizen of himself as he could. He was in thirteen engagements and many skirmishes. During much of the time, he was sharpshooter and though in many close places and though his clothing was pierced by many bullets, he never received a wound. He saw many men shot down at his side and endured all the hardships of a soldier's life. After the war, he went where his father was living in Oregon county, Missouri and engaged in farming, having lost everything during the war. He had lost trace of his son but found him later in Cooper county, Missouri.

On March 1, 1866, Dr. Chastain married Miss Mary J. King, who was born in Greene county, Illinois. She had moved thence to Tennessee and later to Howell county, Missouri, accompanied by her parents, Wilsey P. and Eliza P. King. The father was a soldier in the army and died in Klamath county March 17, 1904, aged eighty-four. The mother had died in Howell county, Missouri ten years ago. In the fall of 1867, Dr. Chastain moved to Izard county, Arkansas and engaged in the mercantile business. After that, he raised cotton and later moved to Boone county, Arkansas where he was editor of the Boone County Record, at Bellefonte, Arkansas. He fitted up two wagons with ox teams and on April 28, 1875, started with a train of emigrants across the plains to Oregon. At Cheyenne he sold one outfit and in due time reached Moonville on the Rogue river. He located on October 15, on a rented farm and began the practice of medicine. He soon was very busy, riding forty miles in every direction. Finally, we find him at Phoenix, Oregon, where he had a large practice and also operated two drug stores. Later, the doctor sold out and moved to Williamsburg, Oregon, continuing his practice, then returned to Phoenix. Finally in April, 1888, he came to Bonanza and here took up the practice of medicine. He had all he could do and his family handled a hotel and feed barn, and also conducted a farm. In 1901, the doctor sold the hotel and barn and moved to his ranch. Later, he traded that for town property and retired from business. He is now comfortably fixed in Bonanza while he and his wife are enjoying the competence that their labor and skill have provided. The doctor has filled various positions, as, justice of the peace, notary public, was member of the first council in Bonanza and president of the board, and is now town recorder. For forty-six years he has been a Mason and a member of the Baptist church. He was baptized by his grandfather, Rev. Joseph Chastain. Mrs. Chastain is also a member of the church and of the Rebekah and Eastern Star lodges. To the last marriage of the doctor ten children have been born: Charles, deceased; George, married to Effa Sutton, at present clerk of Klamath county; Cora, Price, and Adah, all deceased; Ann Elizabeth, wife of A. T. Langell; Etta, wife of R. I. Kilgore; Claude, clerk in a store; Sarah J., wife of Robert L. Goss; and John K., a harness maker in Bonanza. The doctor and his wife are hearty, genial people, highly respected and substantial. They have educated their children well and are happily located in that all live near by and are prosperous.

MARION HANKS, who resides about one mile north from Klamath Falls, was born on July 28, 1865, in Douglas county, Oregon. His parents, James L. and Mary J. (Perdue) Hanks, are mentioned in another portion of this work. Marion remained with his parents in Douglas county until 1873 being then eight years of age, when the family came to this county, then included in Lake county. He received his education in the public schools and grew up here so that he is practically a product of this county. After school days, he learned the butcher business and followed the same for about eight years in Klamath Falls.

Then he sold out and purchased the ranch where he is now residing, which consists of three hundred and eighty-five acres. He turns his attention to farming and stock raising and has a nice band of well bred cattle, besides some horses. Just recently, Mr. Hanks sold his farm for twelve thousand dollars but he is still residing upon it. He owns his cattle and personal property and will soon secure a new location. He has made a splendid success in financial matters and is considered one of the leading men of Klamath county.

Fraternally, he is affiliated with the A. O. U. W., has filled all the chairs and has represented his lodge in the grand lodge.

On September 24, 1903, Mr. Hanks married Miss Amelia Hedrick, who was born in St. Louis, Missouri, the daughter of Otto and E. E. Hedrick, natives of Germany. Mrs. Hanks came to Portland, Oregon with her family when a child. The year following, about 1876, they came to Klamath Falls, where the father remained until his death. To our subject and his wife two children have been born, Eva and Leona Fern.

Mr. Hanks is a reliable and esteemed man and is one of the leading citizens of the county.

STEPHEN HERLIHY resides at Naylox, which is eleven miles north from Klamath Falls on the east bank of Klamath Lake. He was born on October 16, 1870 in the county of Victoria, province of Ontario, Canada. His father, Jeremiah Herlihy, was born in Canada and came of Irish parents. Later in life he moved to Rochester, New York, and there remained until his death. He married Miss Katherine O'Shea, a native of Canada. Her parents were born in Ireland. At the age of seventeen our subject left home and came to North Dakota. There he worked some in handling horses and finally went to Itasca county, Minnesota and entered a homestead in the timber. Being an expert hand in handling a threshing machine, he used to go each year to the wheat districts where he received seven dollars per day with the threshing crew. After a while, he took a stone and timber claim adjoining his homestead which gave him a full section of fine timber land. After the election of McKinley in 1896, owing to the protective tariff on lumber, Mr. Herlihy sold it at a very fine price, reserving the land for himself, which he still owns. He had endured great hardships and did much arduous labor but reaped a good reward for it all. Then he took a trip to Rochester, New York to see his people and in 1900, he determined to see the Pacific coast. He purchased a ticket to Seattle but stopped over in Spokane where he fell in with a party who told him about Klamath county. Becoming greatly interested, he traveled thither and after viewing the country over thoroughly, he purchased his present place. This was known as the Captain Frie station as that gentleman had built a toll road in early day and kept here a toll gate. It was a very famous camping place for the Indians in early days and by them was called Naylox, which means daylight. Mr. Herlihy owns a half section of fine meadow land, a large two-story house and considerable stock. He has two large barns and plenty of other outbuildings and all other improvements needed and in addition to his general farm and stock raising, keeps a hotel and a feed stable. Being on the main traveled road, he keeps a large number of guests. Mr. Herlihy is so well pleased with this country that he is determined to make this his permanent home.

On May 24, 1903, occurred the marriage of Mr. Herlihy and Miss Elanore Garlarneau, who was born in Portland. Her father, Charles Garlarneau, was born in Canada and came to Oregon thirty-five years ago. He has been a resident of Klamath county for twenty years. He married Eliza Ryan, a native of Ireland. Mrs. Herlihy graduated from the state normal school at Ashland and taught for some time in Jackson county, before her marriage. Mr. Herlihy started in life a poor boy and everything he possesses has been won by hard labor and wise management and it is very gratifying to know that from his modest start, he has won his way to competence and wealth. He is one of the substantial men of the county and is considered a leading citizen.

GEORGE WASHINGTON MORINE. Since thirteen years of age the gentleman, of whom we now have the pleasure to speak, has been doing for himself and although having traveled a great deal and been in various enterprises, his financial ability has been such that he has never been without money. He was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on December 6, 1848. His father, Antoine Morine, was born in Toronto, Canada, of French ancestry and came to St. Louis in early day. He resided in that portion of St. Louis known as Frenchtown, until the spring of 1852, when he started across the plains with his family. His team being a part of the very first ox train that made its way to Hangtown, later known as Placerville. There he took up mining and also followed it in various places. His death occurred in Jackson county, Oregon, in 1896, he being then in his eightieth year. His mother lives in St. Louis, being one hundred and four years of age. The mother of our subject, Mary Magdalene (Cook) Morine, was born in Germany, came to St. Louis when a child and died soon after coming to the Pacific coast. The children of this worthy couple are Mrs. Henrietta Woodliff, deceased; George W., who is our subject; Albert, of Jackson county; Charles E. and Frank, twins, a farmer in Jackson county and a farmer in Bonanza, respectively; Mrs. Eliza Burch, of Red Bluff, California; and Mrs. Cynthia V. Reeves, of Oakland, California. Our subject accompanied his parents across the plains in 1852 and was with them until thirteen years of age. At that time, his mother died and then he began work for himself. He worked in a blacksmith shop until he had mastered the trade and at the age of twenty, started a shop of his own, this being in Colusa county, California. For several years he beat the anvil there, being well known and highly respected. In 1881, he came to Central Point, Jackson county and opened a shop. There and in other places he wrought at his trade, being one of the best blacksmiths in the state. In 1898, he came to Fort Klamath and did blacksmithing and stock raising until 1901, when he sold out and removed to Bonanza. Here he purchased a hotel and livery barn and since that time has been successfully operating these enterprises. His barn is sixty-five by seventy-five feet, supplied with water from living springs near by and equipped with good rigs and horses. His hotel is a seventeen room structure, well furnished and provided with the best the land affords. Mr. Morine secures his share of patrons both in the livery barn and hotel and is a popular man in this part of the county.

In 1881, Mr. Morine married Miss Addie Clift, who was born in Canada. She came to Jackson county, Oregon with her parents when a child. Six children have been the issue of this union; Alice, wife of Charles Conrad of Aurora Grande; Henrietta, a clerk in a shoe store in Klamath Falls; Silas F.; Mabel; and Harold and Harry, twins. The last named died at Fort Klamath. Mr. Morine is a member of the I. O. O. F. and is a very enterprising and substantial man.

JAMES LOUIS HANKS, who resides about three miles north of Klamath Falls on the east bank of Klamath Lake, was born on February 14, 1820. His native place was a farm near Decatur, Macon county, Illinois. His father was John Hanks and his mother, Susan (Wilson) Hanks. She was born in Grayson county, Kentucky and came from English ancestors. Her death occurred in 1863. The father's father, William

Hanks, the grandfather of our subject, came from Ireland to Virginia before the Revolution. He and two of his brothers served in that war, one of them being Colonel Benjamin Hanks under General Washington. William Hanks was a brother of Nancy Hanks, who married Thomas Lincoln. They were the parents of President Lincoln. This makes our subject a second cousin to that great man. The Lincoln farm adjoined the Hanks estate in Macon county and as John Hanks was a first cousin to Abraham Lincoln, they became very intimately acquainted. He was born on February 9, 1802 in Nelson county, Kentucky and for a while lived in Grayson county, that state. He was a few years older than Abraham Lincoln and the latter made his home with John Hanks for many years. These two young men used to split rails together and in company made several trips down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers in the old time flat boats. In 1828, he moved to Decatur, Macon county, Illinois, and on the trip passed by the home of Thomas Lincoln in Indiana. Mr. Lincoln requested Mr. Hanks to inquire what kind of a country Illinois was and as the report was favorable, the Lincolns moved on out, settling near the Hanks farm. They were very hard working people and when the Black Hawk war broke out in 1832, John Hanks and Abraham Lincoln enlisted in the same company, the latter being captain of the company. Being thus together so much, they became intimately acquainted and in 1860, when Mr. Lincoln was nominated for president at Chicago, Mr. Hanks had the distinction of carrying one of the rails split by Mr. Lincoln. At the commencement of the Civil War, John Hanks enlisted in the Twenty-First Illinois as wagon master, although he was about sixty years of age, and served faithfully for two years in Missouri, Tennessee, Arkansas, Alabama and Mississippi, until he was incapacitated by an attack of rheumatism, when he was honorably discharged at Winchester, Tennessee, in 1862. He had made the trip across the plains to California in 1850 and returned to Illinois later and there made his home until his death in 1889. The brothers and sisters of our subject were eight, five of whom are now living; Mrs. Emily Loomis of Bloomington, Illinois; Grayson A., of Maysville, Missouri; Mrs. Mary E. Manon, of Humboldt county, California; and Levi, of Macon, Illinois. Our subject grew up on the farm in Illinois, was much with Abraham Lincoln in those days, and in the spring of 1850, came across the plains to California with his father and two years later, they returned via the isthmus. In the spring of 1853, Mr. Hanks started from Decatur, Illinois, and crossed the plains with ox teams the second time. He stopped at Springfield, Illinois and bid his cousin, Abraham Lincoln, good by, and this was the last he ever saw of him. After reaching California, he spent some time in mining, visiting nearly every prominent camp, and finally in 1859, came to Douglas county, where he mined.

In Douglas county, on September 25, 1861, Mr. Hanks married Mary J. Perdue, who was born near St. Joseph, Missouri on February 14, 1845. Her father, John Perdue, was a native of Virginia and came from German ancestry. They came across the plains in 1852, settling in Douglas county, Oregon where he lived until his death, in 1901. He had married Mary F. Mills, a native of Virginia. She died in 1902. They were aged eighty-two and eighty-four, respectively, at the time of their death. Mr. Hanks did considerable freighting in the early days through southwest Oregon and was also out during the Modoc war when it was very dangerous. He endured many hardships and performed much arduous labor. In the spring of 1873, he located where he now resides, taking a homestead near the site of his present dwelling. He was among the very first to settle here and since that time has been a progressive and enterprising citizen. He now has three thousand acres of fine soil, mostly under cultivation. His crops are grain and hay and he owns a large threshing outfit besides all machinery necessary. His residence is a good eight room, two story structure, while three large barns and various outbuildings, orchard and many other things are in evidence on the place. He has made his farm one of the finest in the country and an air of thrift and taste pervades everything. In addition to general farming, Mr. Hanks handles considerable stock and has a fine herd of registered Durhams and Galloways. He also has a nice band of horses. In 1876, Mr. Hanks was elected county treasurer on the Democratic ticket. In 1878, he was elected sheriff and was twice re-elected making six years in that office. After that, he was chosen county commissioner which completed ten years in constant service for the county, in all of which he showed unswerving integrity and uprightness so that he has won the esteem and confidence of all who know him. He brought the same wisdom and good practical judgment to bear in the discharge of his duties that he did in his own affairs and the result was of much benefit to Klamath county.

Mr. Hanks is a member of the A. F. & A. M. and has been for thirty years. He is also a charter member of the Klamath lodge.

To Mr. and Mrs. Hanks, ten children have been born, named as follows: John, of Red Bluffs, California; Marion, in this county; Mrs. Ella Eastwood of Mono county, California; Malinda, deceased; Emma, deceased; Jessie, at home; Mrs. Effie Hill, of this county; Louis, of California; Edward, deceased; and William, of Klamath Falls.

It is interesting to note that when Mr. Hanks came to Klamath county, he had very little means but at the present time, he is one of the wealthy citizens of the county, all of which has been gained by his own labor and wisdom.

REV. JAMES T. ROBERTS is well known in Klamath county and adjacent sections, being both a stockman, farmer and a preacher of the gospel. He resides in Poe valley near Bedford postoffice and was born on January 9, 1853, in Washington county, Arkansas. His father, Joel (Lee) Roberts, was born in Kentucky and went with his parents to Indiana. Then they removed to Illinois, later to Missouri and finally to Arkansas. His mother was a sister of Gen. Robert E. Lee. During the war he went to Arkansas but had to return to Missouri as a refugee, and there enlisted in the union army, being a member of the state militia. In 1886 he came to Poe valley, this county, where he engaged in the stock business. Here he remained until his death in September, 1903, being at that time in his seventy-ninth year. He was a devout member of the Methodist church, South. He married Malinda Spencer, also a native of Kentucky, who is now living with our subject and his brother, Elijah W. She is seventy-five years of age and has been a life long member of the Methodist church, South and is a devout and honorable Christian woman, highly esteemed by all. Our subject is one of eleven children, six of whom are now living, named as follows: Mrs. Julia Marsh, of Salem, Oregon; John J., of North Yamhill, Oregon; James T., who is our subject; Elizabeth J., the wife of Hiram Roberts, he being the same name but no relation, and now residing in Poe valley; Elijah W., who is the partner of our subject; and Mrs. Rosa Taylor, of Olene, Oregon. At the age of eleven, James T. went with his parents to Missouri and later learned the barber trade, which he followed for fifteen years. During this time he was rather a wild young man, paying little attention to the claims of God and his soul, preferring rather the pleasures of a season to religious ways. In 1890 he came to Poe valley, where his parents and brothers were living, and soon thereafter he was led to grasp the faith of the Scriptures and turned his attention to their study. He soon was licensed to preach, having joined the South Methodist church, the date of his first licentiate being June, 1896, in Roseburg district. He preached in Langell and Yonna valleys and is very earnest in this labor. Soon after coming here he entered into partnership with his brother, Elijah W., and they went to work by the month to get a start. They invested their earnings in cattle and gradually became more deeply engaged in the stock business, purchasing land betimes and increasing their herds. They now own over seven hundred acres, two hundred acres being natural meadow and about two hundred acres in cultivation. They also have four hundred acres in the Klamath Basin under the ditch and eighty acres are seeded to alfalfa. They own a fine band of cattle and horses, having gained their entire property holdings by their own industry and excellent management. They are hard working men, highly respected and upright.

FRANKLIN PIERCE VAN METER is one of the enterprising men who have made Klamath county the prosperous political division she is today. His residence is in Poe valley, near Bedford and there he owns a fine estate of two hundred and forty acres, half of which is under cultivation. He was born in Lasalle county, Illinois, on August 9, 1854. The father, Jacob R. VanMeter, was born in Grayson county, Kentucky and came to Illinois in 1852. Five years later he moved to Kentucky and was a veteran of the Mexican War. The mother of our subject was Rhoda (Hackley) VanMeter, a native of Kentucky. She died in Redding, California in 1893, aged seventy-six. The children of the family are named as follows: Dr. Abraham, a prominent physician at Lamar, Barton county, Missouri and who followed his profession four years in the Civil War; Isaac L., now deceased, who served his country four years in the Rebellion, being corporal; James H., deceased; Dr. Miles E., one of the most prominent and skillful physicians and surgeon in San Francisco, California, being also a lecturer on surgery and medicine; Franklin P., who is our subject; Marion L., a mechanic and farmer of Poe valley; George W., a machinist in Los Gatos, California; John H., a farmer and stockman in Poe valley; Charles E., a leading machinist of San Francisco whose skill brings him a salary of two hundred and forty dollars per month; Mrs. Sarah E. McClure, deceased; and Mary, deceased. Our subject grew up on a farm in Missouri and also learned the engineer's art. His education was received from the common schools and he made the best of his opportunities. In 1876, he went to Colusa county, California and engaged in engineering. Two years later, he returned to Missouri and on August 13, 1878, there married Miss Maggie A. Carter, a native of Linn county, Missouri. Her father, Collin T. Carter, was born in Kentucky and came to Missouri in the early forties. In the spring of 1862, he joined a wagon train for Sacramento, Mrs. VanMeter being one of the children then in the family. In 1867 the family returned to Linn county via the Panama route and in all, they made five trips across the plains. He died at Springfield, Missouri, in 1900, aged sixty-six. He came from Irish extraction. The mother of Mrs. VanMeter was Emily M. (Sandusky) Carter, a native of Kentucky, who died in 1872, in Linn county, Missouri. The other children of the family are William S., of Greene county, Missouri; Lee D., of the same county; Mrs. Emily Adams, deceased; and George, deceased. In the spring of 1882 Mr. VanMeter came to Colusa county, California and engaged as a stationary engineer. For three years afterward, he was foreman on a ranch and in the spring of 1894, he came to Poe valley and located a homestead. He soon brought his family here and a careful invoice of his capital showed that beside his wild land, he had only five dollars in cash in all his holdings. He had very little else to do with, but undaunted, Mr. VanMeter took hold with his hands and has made a splendid success financially. His farm is well improved, having a house, barn and other accessories. He has a good band of cattle, some horses, plenty of implements for the ranch, and altogether he is one of the prosperous men of Klamath county. He has labored assiduously since coming here and has shown himself a man of uprightness and unswerving integrity. The children born to this family are Roy L., Gertie, and Clara May. Roy L. is raising stock and farming in Poe valley. Gertie holds a first-class certificate and has taught school throughout the county. She possesses a fine talent in drawing and is an artist of considerable note, having made some very excellent pictures. Her people justly take considerable pride in her labors and give her the encouragement that she so thoroughly merits. Mr. VanMeter has been a great traveler, having crossed the plains five times, and is a man of wide experience and good ability. He comes from a strong family and he and his wife are among the most substantial and progressive people in this part of the country.

Her family also is from English ancestry. Mrs. Bryant was educated in the public schools and in the seminary and taught school for thirteen years while her husband preached the gospel. In March, 1889, they emigrated to Klamath county, Oregon and for a few years, Mr. Bryant was engaged in preaching. Next we see him in Applegate and later in Medford. After that, he united with the Congregational church at Ashland, Oregon, and held various pulpits in Jackson county and other places. Then he was Sunday school organizer in Jackson county, Oregon, preached in California and also in various other places. His home for eight years has been constantly at Klamath Falls but he has made trips to the various fields of labor. WILLIAM HENRY McCLURE. Klamath county has many vigorous and enterprising men but few of them have been more active and progressive than the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this sketch. He is a farmer and stockman in 'Poe valley, his estate being near Bedfield postoffice and an epitomized review of his career would be interesting to the citizens of this county.

W. H. McClure was born July 24, 1862, in Linn county, Missouri, the son of James F. McClure, a native of Kentucky and born about 1842. The father came to Linn county, Missouri when a child of six years and later served in the state militia. He remained there until his death. His ancestors were of Irish extraction and he married Sarah VanMeter, a native of Illinois, who died in Missouri. Our subject has three sisters who married brothers, Mrs. Mattie E. Foster, Mrs. Laura E. Foster, Mrs. Rhoda Foster. William H. grew up in Linn county, Missouri and received a fair education and when eighteen years and five months of age, on December 24, 1880, married Miss Irene Roberson, who was a native of the same place as her husband. Her father, Ed Roberson, came from Virginia, being one of the pioneers of Lincoln county and a highly esteemed citizen. He married America Easley, a native of Virginia and they are both now deceased. In 1881 our subject with his wife came via San Francisco to Portland, experiencing three wrecks on the railroad and a severe storm at sea without any loss of life. Being of an active and roving disposition, Mr. McClure always desired to see the place just ahead and he has traveled with his wife over almost all the United States. They have visited every principal city and it is with no small pride that he can remark that he has made plenty of money for all their journeys. They have made two trips to the Atlantic coast, have been seven times to the Mississippi valley and traveled nine times up and down the Pacific coast. His wife has accompanied him on all these trips and he has followed numerous occupations in various parts of this great Republic. Finally in 1887, he selected a place in Klamath county and here he has resided every since. He immediately gave his endeavors to stock raising and farming and also in the past eleven years has been doing butchering, selling the meat over the country. He has slaughtered over two thousand beeves besides other animals and has made a good success in this enterprise. Such a life of activity as Mr. McClure has led has not been without much hardship and adversity yet he has overcome all and is now well-to-do, owning two hundred and twenty acres of land well improved besides other property. At this present writing, Mr. McClure and his wife are enjoying a trip to the world's fair at St. Louis whence they expect to return to their Klamath county home and for a time at least, retire from active labor, renting the property. Five children have been born to this union, Georgia Gertrude, the wife of Benjamin Johnson, James E., Virgile, Charles Amos, Flossie. Mr. McClure landed here without capital but has made such a good success that he is rated among the substantial and well-to-do men, with plenty of means to enjoy the good things of life. He is a good and respected citizen and has hosts of friends while he and his wife have always labored for the upbuilding of the country and the advancement of its interests in such a manner that they have accomplished a great deal, both for themselves and theirs.

JOHN FRED GOELLER, who came to Klamath Falls in very early days, is one of the wealthy men of the county. He has been an active business man here during all the intervening years and is personally very closely connected with the upbuilding of the country. He stands at the head of a large manufacturing plant and has shown himself a man of ability and enterprise. His plant embraces machinery for the manufacture of lumber, of all kinds of building material and is one of the most important institutions in the county. It is a large two-story structure located on the wharf, is provided with the latest and best machinery and is conducted in a manner that demonstrates Mr. Goeller's ability as a machanicist and manufacturer. He has followed contracting and building in connection with his manufacturing work and all of the larger buildings of this part of the state, show his handiwork. A detailed account of Mr. Goeller's life is an important part of Klamath county's history and with pleasure we append the same.

John F. Goeller was born in Winesburg, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, on January 22, 1860. His father, John M. Goeller, was born in Sandusky county, Ohio and his father, the grandfather of our subject, came from Germany. John M. Goeller was a butcher and now resides at Beach City, Ohio. He married Barbara Woener, a native of Ohio, and a descendant from German ancestors. The brothers and sisters of Mr. Goeller are John, a jeweler in Payette, Idaho; George and William of Pratt county, Kansas; Charles and Caroline of Beach City, Ohio. Our subject received a good common school education during the first eighteen years of his life and was apprenticed to learn the carpenter trade. While working at that in the day, he spent his evenings in studying at a business college. At the age of twenty-two, he went to Nemaha county, Kansas and followed his trade there for eight years. In 1890, we find Mr. Goeller in San Francisco, later in Santa Rosa, then in Alameda, following his trade in all these places. Finally in September, 1891, he landed in Klamath Falls, Oregon and soon purchased a half interest in a planing mill and door factory, his partner being A. M. Peterman. The firm name was known as Peterman and Goeller. In the spring of 1892, Mr. Peterman sold his interest to C. A. Dillon and the firm was known as Goeller and Dillon. Later, C. H. Witherow bought Mr. Dillon's interest and the firm was known as Goeller and Witherow. He later sold to O. H. Harshburger and the firm was known as Goeller and Harshburger. Finally in 1896, Mr. Goeller bought his partner's interest and since that time has handled the entire business himself. He is now doing a large business, both in building and in the manufacturing field and is one of the leading men of the country. In addition to the property mentioned. Mr. Goeller owns two and one-half sections of fine timberland, has a quarter section of agricultural land, has a large number of fine business lots and a beautiful residence situated in a plot of ground one hundred and sixty by two hundred feet. The same is beautified by trees and so forth, while the dwelling is one of the best in the county. It is a ten room structure of modern architectural design, supplied with all the conveniences of the day. He has the house heated by a fine furnace, lighted by electricity and acetalene gas and everything bespeaks a man of ability and culture. Mr. Goeller handles in addition to his business, a large stock of builders' hardware, paints, oils and so forth, and does a good trade. Politically, he is an influential man and always takes a keen interest in all the campaigns. He was elected chairman of the Democratic central committee for the county and has served in the city council. He has always shown himself a man of progress, public spirited and ready to assist in any line for the building up of the country.

On September 1, 1887, at Garden City, Kansas, Mr. Goeller married Miss Alice Sawyer, who was born near Boyle, Kansas, on January 21, 1868. Her parents are Cyrus A. and Delia F. (Hull) Sawyer, natives of Kentucky and Ohio, respectively. The father emigrated to Missouri in early days and at the time of the Civil War, went to Kansas where he served as a teamster in the army. The mother came to Kansas with her parents when a girl. Mr. and Mrs. Sawyer are now living at Fairview, Kansas. The other children of the family besides Mrs. Goeller are: Clara B., deceased; Mrs. Lula Rutherford, deceased; Bertha E., who has the degree of D. O. and presides in Ashland, Oregon; Cyrus H., Walter M., Lawrence L., Daisy M., all in Brown county, Kansas. Mrs. Goeller was well educated and had prepared herself for school teaching prior to her marriage. To our subject and his estimable wife, three children have been born, Harry E., Hazel M., and Barbara F.

Mr. Goeller is a member of the I. O. O. F. in Klamath Falls, is past grand, and was delegate to the grand lodge in Oregon in 1902. He also belongs to the encampment. He and his wife are members of the Rebekahs, she being past grand of that order and in 1903 was delegate to the grand lodge. Mr. Goeller belongs to the A. O. U. W. and he and his wife also belong to the order of Washington.

CHARLES IRA ANDREWS, a well known merchant at Olene, was born October 9, 1867, in Mower county, Minnesota. His father, Webster Andrews, was a native of Maine and emigrated to Minnesota in early days. He served in the Seventh Minnesota Infantry until wounded then lay for many weary months in the hospital at Memphis. After the war, he came to Lincoln county, Kansas and took a homestead. Later, he moved to Ellis county at Fort Hayes and was engaged in farming and in the livery business. In 1881, he traveled across the plains with a large emigrant train of some three hundred families. In March, they left Fort Hayes and journeyed via North Platte where they saw Buffalo Bill, and then on to Fort Laramie. Under inducements of the railroad company, that they would receive high wages in the west, the emigrants shipped their stuff to Ogden but were unable to secure the employment and the company refused to give them their goods until they would secure the company by a mortgage upon them. This they refused to do and a pitched battle ensued. The company called the soldiers to their assistance. Finally a settlement was made and the company carried the emigrants on to Poetello, Idaho. Again they had trouble and thirty of the train got away with their outfits and continued the journey. Later, they were overtaken by armed men sent by the company and the emigrants disarmed their assailants and sent them back empty handed. In crossing the desert, they paid as high as three dollars per barrel for water. Finally, they reached Portland and the father secured a farm, twenty miles east of that city. There he remained until his death in 1891. The mother of our subject was Cyrena Andrews, a native of Maine. She died in 1885. There were nine children in the family. Our subject grew up on the farm and received his education from the common schools and as early as sixteen, went to logging. Later he got the contract of carrying the mail from East Portland to Eagle creek and continued it for six years. He secured eighty acres of land near the home place and improved it well and in 1891, came to Klamath county. Here he did logging. In January, Mr. Andrews married Miss Georgia Cottrell at Klamath Falls. She was born in Milwaukee county, Wisconsin, the daughter of George and Carrie Cottrell. They farmed here and later lived at Ashland, Oregon. Three children have been born to this union, Carrie C., Clyde C., and Alta A. Later, Mr. Andrews returned to his Portland farm but owing to ill health came again to Klamath county. He still owns the Portland property. In 1901, Mr. Andrews took a homestead near Olene and later bought a small tract of land in town. Upon this latter he erected a nice store building and has a good stock of general merchandise, including dry goods, groceries, hardware, boots, shoes, gents' furnishing and so forth. He is doing a fine business and best of all his health is fully recovered in this excellent climate. He and his wife are substantial and highly respected people and are among the leading citizens of this part of the country.

ARTHUR C. LEWIS, a prominent stockman of Klamath county, also owns and operates a city meat market in Klamath Falls. He does a general wholesale and retail business in meats and is one of the prosperous and entergetic business men of the town. He was born on September 5, 1871 at Bedford, Iowa, the son of Leonard A. and Mary A. (Bruner) Lewis, natives of Indiana and Iowa, respectively. The father was a veteran of the Civil war. Besides our subject, they had the following named children, Mrs. Nellie Moore, Charles C., L. Alva, C. Leon, and Lester and Leslie, twins, deceased. Our subject came with his parents to Greenwood, Colorado in 1873 where the father engaged in stock-raising until 1885. In that year they came to this section and followed the same business until his death in March, 1902. The mother is still living on the old home place which adjoins the town of Klamath Falls. After attending the common schools until he was twenty years of age, our subject thirsted for more education and accordingly began to work his way through the state agricultural college at Corvallis. After four years of arduous labor, paying his own expenses by his labor entirely, he graduated with well earned honors and returned to Klamath county and took up the stock business. After operating here for two years, he went to Clackamas county and began raising teasels for the woolen mills. For three years, he did that successfully and then came back to this county and again embarked in the stock business. Since that time, he has continued uninterruptedly in that industry. He handles cattle and horses and is fast breeding his cattle into thoroughbreds. He makes a specialty of full blood Herefords and Shorthorn cattle and is very successful. His estate consists of three hundred acres of choice meadow land three miles out from Klamath Falls on the Klamath river. It is a very valuable place, producing abundant returns of hay. In addition to this, he has one hundred and sixty acres, fifteen miles southeast from town on Lost River. He also owns valuable property in Klamath Falls. For two years, he has been conducting the City Meat Market and has won for himself splendid returns.

On May 25, 1899, in Clackamas county, Oregon, Mr. Lewis married Miss Iva M. Sawtell, who was born in Clackamas county, November 8, 1875. She spent two years at Corvallis in college when her husband was there. Her father, A. J. Sawtell, was of English birth and was one of the well known pioneers of Oregon. He died in September, 1901. Her mother, Eliza E. (Dibble) Sawtell, crossed the plains with her parents in early days and was a pioneer of the state. To Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, two children have been born, Rollin O. A., and Ruby Ollis.

Fraternally, we find Mr. Lewis affiliated with the W. O. W. and A. O. U. W. He and his wife are members of the Presbyterian church and are leaders in society here.

DANIEL GORDON, SR., is a retired business man residing at Keno, Klamath county, Oregon, who has seen a great deal of life in the east and far west. He was born September 13, 1810, on the bank of the St. Lawrence river, St. Lawrence county, New York, the son of John and Jerusha (Barnett) Gordon. The parents were natives of Scotland, the mother dying while our subject was quite young. The father lived to be over one hundred years of age.

It was but a limited schooling received by the subject of this sketch, but he improved his opportunities and by working around mills and machinery became a most expert machanic. He constructed wool carders, spinning wheels, looms, etc., and becoming an expert millwright constructed saw and grist mills. In 1829 he went to New Orleans and was in the employ of the government for two years. Here he saw his first railroad and enjoyed his first ride on the cars, going from the Crescent City to Fort Pike, a distance of five miles. In 1831 he was engaged in carpenter work in Buchanan county, Missouri, and established a shop where he manufactured wagons and plows. Following a visit to his old home in New York he went to Muskingum county, Ohio, where he became acquainted with his future companion in life, and they were soon afterward married. The name of the bride was Sarah Castle. Remaining there four years the couple then removed to Buchanan county, Missouri. The spring of 1852 he sold out his business, purchased several yoke of cattle, wagons, etc., and journeyed across the plains with an immigrant train. Six months later they arrived at Yreka, California. Here he engaged in dairying, and subsequently built a saw mill costing $13,000. During the Modoc war he served as a volunteer citizen with his three sons, fighting the Indians, and then although over sixty years of age, saw some active service. It was in 1873 that our subject came to Klamath Falls, and built a saw mill near where Keno now stands, the first one in that part of the country, as was the mill at Yreka the first in that district. He now owns one hundred and sixty-five acres of improved land; one-half farm land, the balance timber: He also owns valuable property in Klamath Falls. At the age of ninety-four our subject is in fairly good health, except some inconvenience from an injury by being thrown from a horse in 1902, and he is the oldest inhabitant in Klamath county. Mrs. Gordon died in 1899 at the age of eighty years. Seven children were born to them: Jane, widow of the late Newton Pratt; Mrs. Adeline Sherman, deceased; Mrs. Mary Hamacker, deceased; John, deceased; Daniel, in Klamath county; Alexander, deceased; and Newton, a former deputy sheriff of Klamath county, but now an attorney of Yreka, California.

WILLIAM PERRY WHITNEY is a prominent farmer and stockman residing two and one-fourth miles south and one and one-fourth miles east from Merrill. With his brother, he owns over eleven hundred acres of choice land, part of which lies in Oregon and part in California. They have three hundred and fifty acres seeded to alfalfa and expect to sow at least one hundred and fifty acres more as they have five hundred acres of level land under the ditch. They own an interest in the irrigation ditch besides having a very fine equipment for general farming and stock raising, including a first class steam thresher and everything needed in their business. Mr. Whitney was born on January 18, 1865, at Cottage Grove, Lane county, Oregon. His father, Elkanah, was a native of New York and came across the plains in the early fifties. He settled in Lane county, being one of the pioneers there and wrought until 1871, when he journeyed to Klamath valley. He lived near Klamath Falls for two years, then came to where Merrill now stands, settling first near the California line. He was a prominent man and sturdy pioneer. His death occurred in 1898. He came from a strong American family. John Whitney came from London to the colonies in 1635, being the first American progenitor. The Whitney family took a prominent part in the Revolution and have always been staunch Americans. The father married Mary A. White, a native of Indiana, who crossed the plains with his parents in the early fifties and settled in Lane county. She died in 1896. The children born to this worthy couple were Albert, of Merrill, William P., who is our subject; Daniel M., the partner of our subject and now living with him; Mrs. Caroline Ball, of lower California; Major J. and Johnson, in Merrill; Mrs. Martha A. Brandon and Rosana, of Merrill. Our subject was but six years of age when he was brought by his parents to the Klamath valley and the rest of his career has been spent in this region. He has seen the country grow from an almost unsettled wilderness to its present prosperous condition and has materially aided in building up and developing the same. His education was gained in the public schools here and with his three younger brothers, he has spent the time in ranching and in raising stock. His first work for money was done when he was about sixteen or seventeen, when he herded sheep for thirty dollars per month and continued for twenty-four months in that trying occupation. The brothers all worked together until the spring of 1901, when they divided their property and our subject and Daniel M. entered into partnership. They now possess the property that has already been mentioned and in addition thereto, in 1901, they purchased a two-thirds interest in a general mercantile establishment at Merrill. The business is incorporated under the style of Whitney Mercantile Company and is one of the best in this city. They own a commodious building and well selected stock of all kinds of goods used in this part of the country. The four brothers are interested in a large band of sheep. It is very interesting and instructive to know that the Whitney brothers all started in life without capital and each one now is a wealthy man and a most respected citizen. All this has been gained by their integrity, industry and sagacity. The two brothers have plenty of horses and cattle besides their other stock and many implements.

On June 6, 1901, Mr. Whitney married Miss Augusta Kattenhorn, who was born in Nevada. Her mother is now residing at Merrill. One child has been born to this union, Myra Augusta, now deceased.

Mr. Whitney is a member of the I. O. O. F. and one of the leading citizens of Klamath county.

WILLIAM P. RHOADS is an enterprising business man of Klamath county. He resides in Merrill where he has a choice eight-room dwelling and where the family lives during the school year. His business is sawmilling and he owns a fine plant on Stukel mountain, some seven miles north from Merrill. He has been operating it for some years, with good success. In addition to this he owns four hundred and eighty acres of fine timber land and is becoming a prosperous and well to do man. The fact that he came to this county recently with his finances well depleted and has secured the fine property mentioned in a short time, speaks very flatteringly of his ability as a business man.

W. P. Rhoads, the father of our subject, was born in New York and went to Minnesota in very early day. He was there during the terrible New Ulm massacre and although in imminent danger, he escaped with his life and fled to Iowa. His father, the grandfather of our subject, was killed in the Mexican War. The mother of William P. was Hannah (VanCamp) Rhoads, a native of Pennsylvania. Her father was also killed in the Mexican War. The children of the family are Charles T., William P., who is our subject, Milton and Mrs. Anna Wuestney. Our subject remained in Iowa until fourteen years of age and there received his primary education. Then he came with his parents to the head of the Elkhorn river in Nebraska where his father was engaged in the cattle business. There also his mother died. In the spring of 1888, the father came to Winlock, Washington, and later settled on Vashon Island, where he is now living, aged seventy-four. In 1889, our subject came on to the sound country and soon entered Vashon College, where he completed the commercial course. After graduating from that, he went to work in the mills at different places and soon was a skillful mill man.

He was accustomed to hard labor previous to this, however, as he had earned all the money that paid his expenses in college. Among other mills, he worked at Port Blakely mill and became a first class sawyer. Being economical, he saved his wages and soon bought an interest in a sawmill. This was burned later and resulted in a total loss as they had no insurance on it. Again, Mr. Rhoads went to work for wages and later came to Medford, Oregon. There on September 15, 1893, he married Miss Mattie Boussum, who was born in the Willamette valley. After that, we find Mr. Rhoads in the American Bar mines on the Klamath river, laboring for one year. Then he was appointed foreman and held that position for four years. In 1898 he came to Merrill and leased a ranch. Some time thereafter, he bought a sawmill and in March, 1900, erected it on Stukel Mountain. Since that time, he has given his undivided attention to the operation of his mill and has met with splendid success. He has shown himself one of the substantial and progressive men of the county and is public spirited and bright minded. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Rhoads, Beulah C., Robena R., and Donovan A., deceased.

In fraternal circles, Mr. Rhoads is affiliated with the I. O. O. F. In the spring of 1904, he was nominated on the Republican ticket for clerk of Klamath county but owing to the fact that the county is Democratic, he was defeated, yet only by thirteen votes, which demonstrated his popularity.

ANTONE CASTEL is to be classed as one of the earliest pioneers of Klamath county and he is now one of the leading citizens of Klamath Falls.

On January 17, 1859, in Cologne, on the Rhine, occurred the birth of Antone Castel. He received a good education in the schools in his native country, learning during that time, the English language. When fourteen, he shipped as a deck boy on a merchantman and before twenty years of age, had visited every leading port in the world and had circumnavigated the globe as well as becoming acquainted in many places. In 1879, he landed in New York city and quit the sea. After that, we find him in Chicago and for the next three or four years he was an extensive traveler in the United States, visiting nearly every state and territory in the union. Finally in 1884, he made his way to southwest Oregon and selected a location at Klamath Falls. He had made a study of surveying during his navigation and in 1892, was elected to the position of county surveyor. He was re-elected in 1894 on the Republican ticket and in 1897, was appointed postmaster at Klamath Falls. This position was held for five years. In 1902, he received the nomination on the Republican ticket for county clerk but owing to the county being Democratic, he was defeated. From 1889 to 1892, Mr. Castel was engaged in the livery business. In 1903, he erected a brewery in Klamath Falls and is now owner and operator of this plant. He has a nice establishment, a good trade and has shown commendable wisdom in the conduct of the same.

On May 1, 1894, Mr. Castel married Miss Alpha Engle, who was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. To this union, one child has been born, Alfred B., on June 6, 1895. Mr. Castel has a fine home in Klamath Falls and has won many friends during his life here. He is a man of enterprise and ability and has always taken hold to assist in building up the country.

Joseph P. was born on November 15, 1840 in Maury county, Tennessee. William T. Lee, his father, was a native of Virginia and a first cousin to General Robert E. Lee, who traces his ancestry back to colonial days. He died in Tennessee at the age of seventy-seven. He had married Elizabeth Aldmond, born near Petersburg, Virginia, who lived to be eighty-five years of age. This worthy couple has seven children, only one of whom is living besides our subject, named Dr. J. G. Lee, a prominent physician in the old home county in Tennessee. Our subject had limited opportunities to gain an education but made the best of them and at the age of fifteen engaged in the drug business with his brother, continuing there until the war broke out when he enlisted in Company H, First Tennessee Infantry. He responded to the first call and for three years was captain of his company. He served the Confederacy faithfully and participated in the battles of Sheep's Pass, Shiloh, Corinth, Perryville, Chickamauga, Atlanta, Jonesborough and many others. In addition to this he was in very arduous service in skirmishing much of the time. He was wounded three times and once very severely. After the war he returned to Tennessee and took charge of his father's place and in 1886, decided to come west. He was appointed to take charge of the farm on the Klamath agency and held that position for three years. His wife was assistant teacher in the Indian school. They resigned, owing to the change of administration and came to Klamath Falls, where they opened a hotel. A few years later, Mr. Lee decided to take up the stock business so secured the estate where he now resides and has given his attention to this since. He has a fine meadow farm and raises good stock.

On December 31, 1867, Mr. Lee married Miss Dellie Davis, a distant relative of the noted Jefferson Davis. She was born in the same vicinity as her husband. To this union the following named children have been born: William T., married and following general merchandising in Hanford, California; Emma, wife of F. H. Mills an attorney of Klamath Falls; Minnie, the wife of E. B. Henry, a merchant of Klamath Falls; Aggie; and Louise.

Mr. Lee has been a member of the A. F. & A. M. for forty years. He and his wife are members of the Christian church and are highly respected people. In June, 1904, Captain Lee's name appeared on the Democratic ticket for assessor of the county and although the county is strongly Republican, he was elected by a handsome majority and makes a very efficient and reliable officer.

JOHN V. HOUSTON, proprietor of a thriving restaurant and the Houston opera house in Klamath Falls, is one of the prominent and well known business men who have achieved a marked success here. He was born in a little log cabin near South English, formerly Houston's Point in Keokuk county, Iowa. His father, James H. Houston, was born in Indiana, married in Iowa and settled in Keokuk county and in very early day, came to Oregon. He participated in the Rogue river Indian war and later returned east and followed the hotel business in South English, Iowa. Then he came west and bought an interest with his sons in the business in Klamath Falls, where he continued until his death. He had married Miss Elizabeth J. Tate, a native of Indiana.

Our subject accompanied his parents to Nodaway county, Missouri where his mother died, then he came with his father to Leadville, Colorado in 1878 where the former engaged in mining. Our subject had received a fine common school education, and then he began to learn the newspaper business, serving first on the Leadville Herald. For eight years he was engaged on that paper, then with his partner, Hon. James Little, established the Meeker Herald at Meeker, Colorado, the year being 1885. They built up a good circulation and made the sheet very prosperous, then he sold to his partner and was appointed postmaster at Meeker. Later, he engaged in the printing business, but owing to ill health, sold his entire interest and came west. He finally landed in Klamath Falls and here engaged in business with his brother, Jabe A., under the firm name of Houston Brothers. This was in 1894. His father came on west, afterwards bought the brother's interest and the firm was changed to J. H. Houston and Son. In 1897, they erected the Houston Opera House and on the death of his father, on December 18, 1901, he took entire charge of the business and has successfully continued it since. He has a fine large property well located in the center of the town and owns other property, including the opera house recently erected at Merrill, Oregon. He is one of the prominent citizens here and has been a very faithful laborer in building up the country and bringing in the prosperity that is enjoyed here at this time. Mr. Houston is a public spirited man and takes a keen interest in politics and everything that tends to build up and forward the country.

On December 24, 1882, in Leadville, Colorado, Mr. Houston married Miss Mae McClarren, a native of Ohio. Three children have been born to this union, Thomas Merle, Edna May and Elizabeth Ellen. Mr. Houston has one sister, Mrs. Celia B. Roberts, of Mullan, Idaho.

WILLIAM W. HAZEN, the owner and operator of the Klamath Falls livery barn, is one of the enterprising business men of the town. He was born in Linn county, Iowa, on March 8, 1857, the son of Sears N. and Martha Hazen, natives of Pennsylvania. He has one brother, John P., of this county and one sister, Mrs. Nancy Cameron of Modoc county, California. Our subject crossed the plains with his parents in 1863, coming with ox teams to Sacramento county, California. Six months were consumed on the journey which was about the ordinary trip of that kind at that time. Later, they came to northern California and in 1873, the family, with the exception of the mother, who had died in California, settled on Lost river. It was then in Jackson county, Oregon. Later it was situated in Lake county and is now in Klamath county. The father is now living near Merrill in this county. Our subject was reared on the ranch and educated in the public schools and in boyhood days, rode the range for several years. Then he went in the stock business for himself and later took a trip through Wyoming. Afterwards, he returned to this county and in 1898, he opened a livery business in Klamath Falls. He has one of the largest establishments of the county and does a general sale, feed and livery business and has his place well stock with rigs and horses.

He gets a good share of the public business and is a favorite with travelers, owing to the care and pains he takes to make everything comfortable and safe. In addition to his business here, Mr. Hazen has a nice residence, well located, surrounded by lawn, shade trees and so forth, besides owning other property.

He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and is past grand, while he and his wife belong to the Rebekah lodge. He is past grand of that order and captain of the Rebekah team.

On September 23, 1895, Mr. Hazen married Miss Hattie Arant, who was born in Douglas county, Oregon. Her parents were early pioneers to this state and are now deceased. To Mr. and Mrs. Hazen, one child has been born, Sears N.

IRA R. HANSON is one of the enterprising stockmen of Klamath county and resides on Pelican Bay just one-half mile southwest from Pelican postoffice. The bay is a tributary of Klamath Lake and is in one of the best locations in Klamath county. Ira R. Hanson was born in Anglaise county, Ohio, on September 25, 1862. His father, James Madison Hanson, is a Methodist preacher and is now dwelling in Kansas, where he is active in his profession. He was enrolling officer during the Civil War and his brother, Amaziah, was at one time state treasurer of Ohio. They trace their ancestors back to one John Hanon, who was very prominent in the colonies before the Revolution, being president of the united colonies. James Hanson, the grandfather of our subject, was a veteran of the War of 1812 and lived within thirty days of being one hundred years of age. Our subject's mother, Rosa (Welch) Hanson, is now deceased. Her grandfather was one of the five charter members of the order of Odd Fellows in the United States. The organization was effected in 1819 and he was influential in it. Mr. Hanson has one brother, Albert, and two sisters, Mrs. Elva Arbogast, deceased and Mrs. Jenette G. Copeland, who died some ten years ago in this county. Our subject went with his father to Bates county, Missouri and there commenced his education. Later, he went to Fort Scott and completed his training in the schools, then went to Anderson county, Kansas. In 1886, we find him in New Mexico, whence he journeyed to Arizona and did railroading for a while. During this time, he learned the engineers trade and operated an engine for some time. He traveled over various portions of California and finally in 1893 landed in Klamath county. In 1897 he came to his present place and engaged in the stock business. He has a fine quarter section of hay land and an unlimited range for stock. He owns now one hundred and fifty head of cattle besides a lot of horses and has been prospered exceedingly. Coming here without funds and starting in to build a home he has succeeded so well that today he is worth fifteen thousand dollars at least. Mr. Hanson is active as a guide for home seekers and has the satisfaction of having established many a good location.

On April 11, 1896, Mr. Hanson married Mrs. Hopy (Dodson) Wilson, who was born in Yamhill county, Oregon, the daughter of Robert and Mary L. (Roy) Dodson. The father is deceased and the mother is now living with this daughter. The parents crossed the plains with ox teams in 1847 and settled in Washington county on a donation claim. They came in the same train but were not married until after they arrived in Oregon. Mrs. Hanson's former husband, Thomas Wilson, was of Washington county, Oregon and to them five children were born: Chloe, wife of John Linn, in this county; Clay, a miller in Washington county; Mary, Burke, and Thomas B.

Mr. Hanson is a member of the I. O. O. F. in Klamath Falls. He and his wife are substantial people, well known and highly respected.

KY TAYLOR, a tensorial artist of excellent skill, is handling a thriving establishment in Klamath Falls. He is a genial and good man and has won the confidence and friendship of all who know him. Mr. Taylor is a respected and substantial citizen and one of the pioneers of this part of Oregon. He was born June 6, 1850 in Poweshiek county, Iowa. The parents were Hiram and Margaret (Severns) Taylor, natives of Ohio and early pioneers to Iowa. They are now deceased. Our subject is the only one of the family living and was left an orphan when eleven years of age. Since that time, he has been entirely on his own resources. He gained a good education by industrious effort and in 1868 entered an apprenticeship with a barber, and since that time, he has followed his trade at different times and places. He has a fine establishment in Klamath Falls and owns a half interest on a fine business corner and a store which he rents. Mr. Taylor also has a very nice residence in one of the choice locations of the city and the place is well improved with shade and fruit trees, making it valuable and beautiful. He has always taken an interest in the affairs of the county and has labored hard for its prosperity. In 1881, he came to Reno, Nevada and shortly thereafter journeyed by stage to Aden, California. There he bought a team and wagon and journeyed overland to Portland. Later, he visited other points of the west and northwest and on May 21, 1882, landed in Klamath Falls. For a short time he followed farming and stock raising then removed to town and engaged in the barber and confectionary business. He closed out the store later and continued in the operation of the barber shop ever since. Klamath Falls, it was Linkville, then, was a very small hamlet and but few settlers were in the county. Mr. Taylor has not only witnessed the growth of the county and town in these years but has very materially assisted in their prosperity and upbuilding.

On November 26, 1871, Mr. Taylor married Mrs. Josephine A. Van Valkenburg, of Dutch ancestry. By her former husband she has two sons, Luman G., a prominent mining man of Sumas, Washington and Howard H., a leading stockman of Klamath county and also ex-county treasurer.

JOHN L. JONES, who resides about seven miles northwest from Klamath Falls on Long Lake, was born on April 2, 1854, in England. His parents, Inigo and Agnes L. (Lemmey) Jones are now deceased. At the early age of eleven, our subject left home and went to sea, shipping on the sailing vessel, Maggie, bound for Mediterranean ports. After a voyage of nine months, he returned to England and shipped as an ordinary seaman to Calcutta. Then he went to China and later to San Francisco and in 1871 went to the mines at various points in California. Two years later he went to South America and worked in a saltpeter mine for five years. After that, he again went to sea and held the position of mate on various vessels and traveled all over the globe. Three times he has sailed around the globe and every port of any importance in the entire world has been visited by him. During this long career of thirteen years on the water, he was shipwrecked twice, both times in the English channel, and on those occasions it was only by the utmost exertion that his life was saved. In 1880 he quit the sea at Puget sound and journeyed down to Yamhill county, Oregon where he did farming for seven years. Then he raised hops until 1897, after which he sold out in Yamhill county and came to Klamath county in 1899. He located on Long lake, as stated above, where he owns something over a half section of land part of which is fine meadow and part timber land. It is well located for stock business and he has considerable stock at the present time. In addition to handling his farm and stock, Mr. Jones is logging for Moore Brothers on Upper Klamath Lake and has been so engaged for a long time. He is one of the successful men in this business and is also a leading and a substantial citizen.

On October 23, 1884 in Yamhill county, Mr. Jones married Miss Mary E. Wood, who was born in Nebraska City, Nebraska. Her parents are Ora and Mary E. (Lake) Wood. The father is deceased. To this union thirteen children have been born, eight of whom are living, named as follows: Agnes L., wife of F. Z. Hawkins, Inigo, Lorenzo T., Edith I., Frank M., Mary E., Lillie M. and Richard V.

Mr. Jones is a member of the I. O. O. F. and is well and favorably known. He takes a great interest in politics and in everything that tends to upbuild the country. While Mr. Jones has traveled all over the world, he believes that Klamath county is one of the best sections he has ever visited and is thoroughly in love with the country and the climate. It is interesting to note that while Mr. Jones has been in all kinds of company in his long and extensive traveling, he has never acquired the habit of using tobacco or intoxicating drinks and has set an example worthy to be copied by his associates. He has the following named brothers and sisters: Richard V., Isaac, Mrs. Catharine Chapman, deceased; Inigo; Lorenzo W.; Annie; Thomas; Perinella. Those living are in England. Our subject is the eldest of the family. Since coming to Oregon, Mr. Jones has shown commendable industry and enterprise and is one of the substantial men here.

RUFUS S. MOORE, a lumber manufacturer of Klamath Falls, was born March 7, 1855, in Marion county, Oregon. He came from an old and prominent family of colonial times, many of whom distinguished themselves in fighting for their country. His father, Judge William S. Moore, a native of Illinois, came from Scotch-Irish ancestry and crossed the plains with ox teams in 1849 to Oregon City. He took a donation claim in the Willamette valley and also followed his trade of Millwright. He wrought on the Oregon City plants and also built a flour mill at Salem and in 1873 he came to Klamath Falls.

Here he took to sawmilling and operated a mill at the agency in addition to one at Klamath Falls. He was also postmaster for several years at Linkville, now Klamath Falls, and was appointed the first judge of Klamath county. In 1888, he was elected again to that position but resigned to move to Portland, in 1890. He then built and operated a mill at Gladstone, but later lost his health and died in 1899, at his house in Portland. He married Miss Margaret O. Meldrum, also a native of Illinois who crossed the plains with her parents with an ox train in 1845. They made settlement at Oregon City where her mother is now living, aged eighty-six. Her father passed away in 1890. They were well known and highly respected pioneers. Mrs. Moore is still living, aged sixty-eight. The brothers and sisters of our subject are Charles S., treasurer of the state of Oregon, Mrs. Estella O. Bellinger, Mrs. Frankie Hammond, Mary B., and Henrietta E.

Our subject attended the public schools in the Willamette valley then finished his education in the Willamette University, perfecting himself in surveying. He was in the employ of the United States government, as United States deputy surveyor, for a good many years and surveyed all through the state of Oregon. He came to Klamath county in 1877 and since then has made this his headquarters. In 1887, he and his brother Charles S., went into the sawmill business at Klamath Falls and they now handle a large business. They purchased the property owned by their father and in addition have several thousand acres of timberland. They do all kinds of wood manufacture for building and are one of the large establishments of the county.

On July 7, 1900, Mr. Moore married Miss Clara A. Shaw, who was a resident of Portland, Oregon. Politically our subject has always taken a keen interest in the campaigns and in 1900 was delegate to the national convention which nominated McKinley and Roosevelt at Philadelphia, in 1900. DANIEL M. GRIFFITH lives at Odessa about twenty-eight miles northwest from Klamath Falls. He was born June 19, 1861, in Franklin county, Virginia, the son of Captain S. H. and Mary (Campbell) Griffith, both natives of the same county. Their children number ten, six boys and four girls and nine of them are living. The father was a prominent man in his county, having been sheriff for some time and was quite wealthy at the breaking out of the Civil War. He enlisted in the confederate army as captain and fought through the entire struggle, only to find then that his property was all gone and he was a poor man. He came west to Shelby county, Missouri, and there died about fifteen years since, aged seventy-six. His father, Daniel Griffith, the grandfather of our subject, was a veteran of the Revolution. Daniel M. learned the printer's trade after receiving his education and at the age of fifteen came west to Gunnison, Colorado. For twenty years thereafter he was engaged in mining and has been in all the principal camps in Colorado, Nevada, Arizona, California and Idaho. Also, he has operated a great deal in Oregon. He has been superintendent of some very large properties and is a very successful and thorough mining man. For a good many years he made his home at Sumpter, Oregon, and was the owner of the Griffith placer mines there. In 1901, Mr. Griffith purchased the place where he now resides and two years later, moved over from Sumpter. The place was formerly known as the Poplars and is one of the choicest nooks that nature has made on the Pacific coast. The great Klamath lake lies in front, a magnificent sheet of water. To the back and west rise the Cascades among whose towering peaks is Mount Pitt, capped with snow throughout the year. The springs are as fine as can be found anywhere and lie one half mile west from the lake. So large is the flow of water from them that the steamboat is enabled to make its way right up into the springs. The water is nearly ice cold and on the banks stands the beautiful hotel that Mr. Griffith has just completed. The country adjacent for miles in every direction is beautiful in scenery and filled with all sorts of game, as bear, elk, while the lakes and creeks swarm with trout and aquatic fowl. The steamer makes regular trips from Klamath Falls to Odessa and the summer tourist sees the delights of the mountains with the comforts of civilization right at hand, having the choicest spot for his outing. Mr. Griffith has planned great improvements and every year sees the banks of the lake and the spring, white with the campers' tents. For those who prefer the accommodation, he has provided the best in his hotel and also a large number of separate cottages, all of which may be secured at very reasonable rates. Boats of all descriptions are at hand and everything to make life pleasant and happy for the city sick is to be found. Mrs. Griffith, a most estimable lady, with her mother, personally supervises the hotel and attends to every detail that may bring her guests comfort. They are both ladies of culture and provide a hearty welcome for those who may find their way to this pleasant place. Mrs. Griffith has traveled extensively and is highly educated in English, German, and French, speaking all three of the languages fluently and is a great student of books and nature. With her other accomplishments, she is a first class stenographer, but instead of seeking the busier marts of the world is far happier in this sequestered spot. It will certainly repay every tourist to visit Odessa on Klamath Lake, Oregon if it is possible for them so to do. There is a spot of land adjacent to the spring called "Squaw's Garden" which had been tilled by the Indians for over one hundred years before the white men secured the place. Many spots in the vicinity have historical interest in connection with the aborigines and many beautiful tales are told in connection with these of Indian lives and Indian loves.

Mr. Griffith has erected a sawmill and owns several thousand acres of timber land and in addition to handling the same is doing a fine lumber business. He owns the steamer Alma and makes regular trips from Klamath Falls to Odessa. He also handles stock and owns a fine large dairy. The new steamer "Winema," also makes regular trips to Odessa.

In Victoria, British Columbia, on February 5, 1897, Mr. Griffith married Mary (Thompson) Claye, who was born in Derbyshire, England. By her former marriage, she has one son, Robert Claye, who is a student in the State university in Idaho and is captain of the cadets in the military department.

Mr. Griffith belongs to the Masonic fraternity, while he and his wife belong to the Eastern Star and the Episcopal church. Mr. and Mrs. Griffith are very extensively known although they have been here but a few years and are highly respected people.

RICHARD I. HAMMOND, one of the leading merchants of Klamath Falls, was born July 4, 1851, in St. Louis, the son of William and Isabella Hammond, both natives of Ireland. The father located in St. Louis at an early day, where he followed the profession of an architect and builder. He died when our subject was but two months old. The mother subsequently married Robert T. Baldwin, with whom she came to Ashland, Oregon, in the early '70s. Later they removed to Klamath Falls where she died in 1897, in her seventy-seventh year.

Our subject attended the common schools and, also, the Christian Brothers College in St. Louis, receiving a good business education. In 1872 he came to Ashland, Oregon, with his mother, where he obtained a position as a clerk. During the Modoc Indian War they took refuge in Fort Klamath, where they witnessed the hanging of a number of Modoc Indians. In 1878 Mr. Hammond settled in the Tule Lake country, Klamath county, where he engaged in the stock business. It was in 1880 that he came to Klamath Falls.

November 15, 1882, in Linkville, now Klamath Falls, he was united in marriage to Miss Frankie S. Moore, born at the place where Mt. Angel now stands, in Marion county, Oregon. Her father, Judge William S. Moore, was born in Belleville, Illinois, April 24, 1829. By trade he was a millwright, and in 1849 came to Oregon City, where he assumed charge of the construction of a large flouring mill. This was in the spring of 1850, and the mill is still in operation. In 1870 he was elected treasurer of Marion county by a large majority. In 1878 he was appointed postmaster of Linkville, and at the time of the organization of the county he was appointed county judge, and was elected to the same office in 1888, but resigned in 1890, and removed to Portland. For several years before his death June 10, 1898, he was a confirmed invalid. Her mother, Margaret O. (Meldrum) Moore, was a native of Illinois, and crossed the plains with her parents, settling at Pacific City, near the mouth of Columbia, on the Washington side. She was married in 1854, and is now living in Portland, Oregon, at the age of sixty-eight years. The brothers and sisters of Mrs. Hammond Etta E. Moore. Mrs. Hammond received an excellent education, and taught school four years in Klamath county. Mr. and Mrs. Hammond have three daughters, Mabel K., Bessie M. and Bertha M. They take a profound interest in the education of their children.

Our subject has engaged in various occupations. During five years he clerked in the Linkville Hotel, and in 1890 removed to Portland, where he remained fifteen months. On his return he was appointed postmaster and conducted the office in connection with a small store. In March, 1903, he was burned out, sustaining a loss of about five thousand dollars with no insurance. Nothing daunted he rebuilt on a larger scale, and now has a handsome and commodious store building, in which he carries a complete stock of general merchandise. In addition to the store building he has six rooms in which his family are most comfortably housed. He is agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company and the Oregon Stage Company. During three years he served as a member of the school board. Fraternally he is a member of Klamath Lodge, No. 137, I. O. O. F., also the encampment, No. 46, of which he is treasurer, and Linkville Lodge No. 110, A.

O. U. W. Mrs. Hammond is a member of the Degree of Honor, of which she is past chief, and in 1902 was representative of the grand lodge. She is also a member of the Rebekah degree, and has served two years as financial secretary.

In 1904 Mr. Hammond was nominated on the democratic ticket for the office of county treasurer. He was defeated by a very small majority, the county being strongly Republican and his opponent a cripple.

EVAN ROGERS REAMES, one of the leading capitalists and bankers of Oregon, resides in a beautiful home on the banks of Klamath river, Klamath Falls. The place of his nativity is Litchfield, Montgomery county, Illinois, having been born April 5, 1850, the son of Woodford and Mahulda (White) Reames, both natives of Hart county, Kentucky. Woodford Reames was born April 4, 1811; his wife, April 2, 1825.

The paternal grandfather of our subject, Aaron Reames, although living in the south and being a large slave owner, was found firmly on the Union side when slavery became a national issue. He then emphasized his sincerity by liberating those who had toiled for his personal success in life. Probably of Scotch descent his ancestors settled in Virginia, whence his parents moved to Kentucky, where he was born. During the Civil War he attained to the rank of colonel in the Union army. Aaron Reames was the father of nine children, and lived to an advanced age.

Woodford Reames, the father of our subject, in his youth learned the blacksmith trade, working at the same in Kentucky and, also, after he had removed to Montgomery county, Illinois. In April, 1852, when Evan R. was two years of age, he crossed the plains accompanied by his wife and four children, and a long train of many other emigrants. The family tarried one winter at St. Helens, Columbia county, Oregon, and the following spring Woodford Reames located about one mile south of Phoenix, Jackson county, Oregon, where he secured a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. On this land he made many improvements, and in connection with his farming operations conducted a blacksmith shop, this being one of the first in the neighborhood. Having erected a small log cabin and cleared a patch of ground which he sowed to grain, he removed his family to Talent, and thence to Fort Wagner. In each of these places the settlers had erected stockades to protect themselves from the hostile Indians. Following the Rogue River Indian War, assured of greater safety, they returned to their land and resumed their improvements of a "home in the wilderness." About 1879 he removed to Jacksonville where he lived a retired life until his death in 1884. His wife survived him until 1890. They had a family of six children, the two youngest being born in Oregon; Thomas G., a banker in Jacksonville, Oregon, who died in March, 1900; Martha, widow of Joseph Rapp, of Talent, Oregon; James R., a farmer on the old homestead at Phoenix, Oregon; Dora, the wife of Oliver Harbaugh of Jacksonville, Oregon; Richard, who died in infancy; and our subject, being the fourth of the family.

The latter received a fair education in the public schools of that pioneer period and at the age of nineteen entered upon a six-year clerkship in the store of Major James T. Glenn. At the breaking out of the Modoc Indian War he promptly responded by enlisting as second lieutenant, Compay A, First Oregon Volunteer Cavalry. This was on November 26, 1872. He served until April, 1873, under Captain Harris Kelley, and was detailed to service in southern Oregon and northern California. In his first important battle he received a flesh wound in the leg. Returning he again assumed his old position in the store. In 1881 he was in partnership with his brother, Thomas G., in a general merchandise store, with a branch store at Klamath Falls, then called Linkville, of which Evan R. took control, removing here the same year. In 1886 he disposed of his interest in both stores and turned his attention to stock-raising. His ranch comprised two thousand acres, two miles south of Klamath Falls. He engaged two years in business in San Jose, California, chiefly on account of the superior educational advantages offered for his daughter.

In 1890 Mr. Reames engaged in the hardware business with George T. Baldwin, at Klamath Falls, but in 1898 disposed of his interest and inaugurated a general merchandise and banking business, in company with Alexander Martin & Sons. He purchased Martin's interest in two years and has since conducted the same under the firm name of Reames & Jennings. He is one of the promoters and stockholders of the Klamath Falls Electric Light & Water Power Company, and is treasurer and owner of a quarter interest in the Midway Telephone & Telegraph Company, and is, also, vice-president of the Klamath County Bank. Politically Mr. Reames is independent and he has held many positions of honor in the community. At the organization of Klamath county he was appointed treasurer by the governor, succeeding himself at the following election. He has served several terms in the city council, and has ever been recognized as a broad-minded and public-spirited citizen. He is a member of Klamath Falls Lodge, No. 77, A. F. & A. M., the Knights Templar and the Royal Arch Masons.

October 3, 1873, near Jacksonville, Oregon, he was united in marriage to Jennie E. Ross, a native of Jacksonville, born in 1855. She is a daughter of General John E. Ross, one of the best known Indian fighters in the northwest. They have one daughter, Molette, an accomplished and very popular lady, the wife of F. W. Jennings, of the firm of Reames & Jennings.

ISAAC A. DUFFY, who stands at the head of the Duffy Mercantile Company of Klamath Falls, is a well known business man of accredited ability, whose labors in this county have, for years past, won a success which is gratifying, indeed. He was born in Belmont county, Ohio, on January 12, 1860. His father, Barney Duffy, a native of Ireland, came to the United States when a boy and married Miss Elizabeth Hess, a native of Pennsylvania, of German extraction. He is deceased but his widow is still living in Macon county, Missouri. When a child our subject accompanied his parents from his native state to West Virginia, thence to Missouri, in which place he grew up and received his education. Then he engaged in the drug business, continuing the same for twenty years. At the end of that period, he determined to try the west and accordingly made the journey to Oregon. For a while the stock business employed his energies, his headquarters being on the Owyhee river. After that, we find him at Gray's Harbor in the general mercantile business. Then he moved to various sections and finally located in Palouse City, Washington. In 1897 he journeyed thence to Klamath Falls and being impressed with the location, opened a small general merchandise store. From the beginning he was successful and trade rapidly grew. Finally in 1901 he organized the Duffy Mercantile Company and erected a fine new building in one of the best locations of the city and stocked the same with a full line of dry goods, clothing, groceries, shoes, gents furnishings, crockery and hardware. The trade has increased in a remarkable degree and Mr. Duffy is considered one of the most skillful and enterprising merchants of this part of the state. In addition to this business he is interested in the boats that navigate the Upper Klamath lake which are doing a good business. In every way Mr. Duffy has shown himself to be an enterprising and progressive man and has labored assiduously for the improvement and upbuilding of the country. Every enterprise which is for the betterment of the country and the bringing in of improvements has been fostered and favored by Mr. Duffy. He stands well in the community and is a public spirited man and one of the leading citizens of the county.

During the spring of 1886 he secured a homestead in Klamath county, in the Langells valley, but continued to work for wages, while at the same time sagaciously improving his ranch. For seven years he was in the employment of Gerber Brothers driving beef cattle. He also worked the same length of time for Swanston & Son, both firms having headquarters at Sacramento, California. For them he, also, purchased and sold cattle.

June 15, 1904, Mr. Obenchain was married to Emma Grohs, a native of Placer county, California, where she was reared and educated. Her parents were Fred P. and Mary L. (Brendeau) Grohs. Both of them are dead. She has a brother, Frank P. Grohs, of Klamath county, and three sisters, Mrs. Minnie Martin and Mrs. Lollye Foster, of San Francisco, and Mrs. Jewel Carpenter, of Sacramento.

W., an enterprising and progressive citizen and one highly esteemed by his numerous friends and acquaintances.

JOHN W. BRANDENBURG, an esteemed citizen of Klamath Falls, is now living retired having passed a life of activity. He was born on November 14, 1840 in Richland county, Ohio, the son of John W. and Lydia J. (Sisney) Brandenburg, natives of Maryland and Ohio, respectively. The father's father, William Brandenburg, was born in Germany. He was the son of Solomon Brandenburg, who was a wealthy and influential military man and left Germany owing to some supposed insult to the Richstag. He came to America in 1770. This man was descended from the old and influential Brandenburg family, who has at one time owned the walled town of Brandenburg. Our subject's father came to the coast in 1850 and settled in Linn county and there remained until his death in 1864, being aged sixty-one. The mother was a granddaughter of Colonel Conine, who was a commissary officer under General Washington, in the Revolution. She crossed the plains several years after her husband and died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. M. J. Countiss, at Portland, December 4, 1904, aged eighty-two. The other children of the family besides our subject, are Otho S. and George, the former in Harrisburg and the latter in Portland, Oregon; Mrs. Martha Countiss, in Portland; and Mrs. Annie Kiehlmeyer, of Tacoma, Washington. Our subject went with his parents to Ottumwa, Iowa, in 1845 and his oldest sister is the first white girl born there. In the spring of 1859, he crossed the plains with an emigrant train and settled near Petaluma, California. Later, he came to Linn county and took a normal course in the academy at Lebanon. After his school days were finished he made a trip to the Cariboo mines in British Columbia in 1862, and the same year, came to the Santiam, where he discovered, with five other prospectors, a year later, the Santiam mines, at Quartzville, which caused a marked excitement. For a time, Mr. Brandenburg served as deputy sheriff of Linn county.

On July 8, 1868, at Albany, Oregon, he married Melissa Cooper, who was born in Adams county, Illinois, on December 3, 1849. Her father, William H. Cooper, was born in Kentucky, in 1812 and was one of the early settlers in Adams county. He came to California in 1849, and returned in four years to Adams county, and then went to Putnam county, Missouri. Later, he was in Texas and in the spring of 1862, crossed the plains with ox teams. Settlement was made in Lane county and later, they removed to Linn county where his death occurred in 1880. His father was an officer in the war of 1812 and was of German ancestry. The mother of Mrs. Brandenburg was Mary (Job) Cooper, a native of Indiana. Her father, a Baptist minister, was a native of England. She was the granddaughter of Emily Little, who lived to be one hundred and fifteen years of age. Mrs. Cooper is now living in Albany, Oregon, aged seventy-eight. Her children, besides Mrs. Brandenburg, are Mrs. Martha Elson, Mrs. Nancy Burkhart, Mrs. Sarah Arnold, and Otho. Mr. Brandenburg served seven years in an official capacity at the state penitentiary of Oregon, commencing in 1871, and was a very faithful and trusted officer. Later he had charge of a portion of the asylum at Salem. In 1887, he came to Klamath Falls Indian reservation and took charge of the Indian school, conducting the same for six and one half years, his wife being matron. Later, he had charge of the industrial school at the agency and was disciplinarian. In this last position he served six years. In 1899, they came to Klamath Falls, determined to live retired and there purchased a beautiful home place. It consists of two acres of choice fruit and garden land, a nice residence and other improvements. He also owns one hundred and sixty acres of land near Merrill, a nice tract adjoining the state grounds near Salem and a quarter section of timber.

Mr. Brandenburg is a member of the A. O. U. W. and is a very popular and substantial man. The children of this worthy couple are Altha, the wife of Mr. Pogue, an attorney of Salem, Oregon; Clyde K., of Klamath Falls; Maude M., wife of Horace W. Cox, Indian agent and officer at Quinault, Washington; Floyd K., of Klamath Falls; Grace E., Mabel E. and Earl R. The last three are deceased. It is of interest to note that Count Brandenburg, who was prime minister of Germany in 1848, was of the same family as our subject.

JUDGE HENRY L. BENSON, residing at Klamath Falls, was born July 6, 1854, in Stockton, California. His parents were Rev. Henry C., D. D., and Matilda M. (Williamson) Benson, the father a native of Ohio; the mother of Kentucky.

The ancestors of Rev. Henry L. Benson were of Scotch-Irish descent and early pioneers of Ohio. It was in 1852 that Henry C. came to California as a missionary for the Methodist Episcopal church. He followed preaching and editorial work on various religious journals in California and Oregon, until a few years before his death in 1897, having been fifty years in active work. He died in San Jose, California, in his eighty-third year. The mother of our subject was a granddaughter of the late Earl of Warwick. She was reared in Indiana and was married to Rev. Henry C. Benson at Greencastle, that state, during the period when he was professor of ancient languages at Asbury, now DePauw University, Bishop Simpson being at that time president. Mrs. Benson died at San Jose, California, in December, 1901, about eighty years of age. To them were born a family of twelve children, nine of whom are now living, viz: Sanford G., city editor of the San Jose Daily Mercury; William W., a merchant; our subject; Frank W., an attorney of Roseburg, Oregon, and president of the Douglas County Bank; Fred T., a farmer, near Salem, Oregon; Mrs. Emma E. Goodell, whose husband is an attorney in Alaska; Mrs. Susie P. Carpy; Mrs. Gail E. Perkins, her husband being assistant state treasurer, at Salem, Oregon; and Mrs. Clara Tonkin, living at San Jose, California.

In 1864 our subject came to Portland, Oregon, with his parents, but in 1868 returned to San Jose. There he was matriculated in the university from which he was graduated in 1873 with the degree of A. M. Subsequently he received the degree of Doctor of Literature. He then studied law in the office of Judge Herrington, of San Jose, and was admitted to practice in all courts in 1878. For two years he followed his profession in San Jose, coming to Roseburg, Oregon, in 1880. Here he devoted himself to teaching, and, for a period, was principal in a private academy. It was in 1886 that he went to Grant's Pass where he practiced law, and in 1892 he was elected district attorney for the First Judicial District of Oregon, embracing Josephine, Jackson, Klamath and Lake counties. In 1896 Judge Benson was elected to the Oregon Legislature and was chosen speaker of the house. In 1898 he was elected as one of the two circuit judges for the same district in which he had served as district attorney, on the Republican ticket, and removed to Klamath Falls. He was re-elected in 1904, by an overwhelming majority.

September 7, 1876, our subject was united in marriage to Susie E. Dougharty, born in Lafayette, California, July 14, 1858. To them have been born six children, viz: Rea W., married to Grace Cook, a bookkeeper in San Francisco; Arthur S., department clerk in the supreme court, Salem; Clark, deceased; Gail E., Harry G., and Louise R. Two children have been born to Mrs. Cook, Cyril and Elwood.

Fraternally Judge Benson is a member of the Masons, Elks and A. O. U. W.

JAMES HENRY WHEELER, one of the leading citizens of Fort Klamath and a well known business man, was born in McHenry county, Illinois, on May 1, 1863. His father, James Wheeler, was a native of Vermont and a veteran of the Civil war, dying in the service of his country when our subject was an infant. He had married a Mrs. Anna Holda Whiteman and after her husband's death she married Dr. Wentworth and resided in Kansas until her death, which occurred in 1877. James Henry had a very poor opportunity to gain an education but made the very best of his chance and was largely thrown on his own resources, being but nine years of age when he left home. He worked his passage to Wadsworth, Nevada, at such things as washing dishes, herding cattle and anything that he could find to do. Finally, he desired to see the country on west and in company with some companions of the same mind, journeyed from Wadsworth to Tule Lake, Oregon, where they embarked in stock-raising. He has been in Klamath county since and has met good success in his labors, being now one of the substantial property owners of the county. He has considerable property in the town of Fort Klamath and one of the finest residences there. He has just completed a large hall which is used for lodge purposes and also owns considerable other property.

On March 4, 1896, occurred the marriage of Mr. Wheeler and Miss Gesine Janssen, the daughter of Cornelius and Marie (Olf) Janssen, natives of Germany. Mrs. Wheeler was born April 6, 1878. Her father died in Germany in 1882 and she came to the United States with her mother, making settlement first in Iowa. Later, they came to Klamath county and the mother is residing here. Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler have one child, Grace Marie, who was born January 6, 1897.

Fraternally Mr. Wheeler is a member of the A. O. U. W. and the Foresters. He is past chief ranger of the latter order and is now director of the same. He is also deputy grand master for this district. Politically, he is a very strong and active Republican always taking a keen and very lively interest in the campaigns as well as in everything that is for the building up of the community. Owing to the fact that Mr. Wheeler had little opportunity to gain an education, he is greatly interested in educational matters and not only is providing the best means for the education of his daughter but is an ardent worker for the betterment of all school facilities. Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler are highly esteemed people and have very many friends in the country.

MARK L. BURNS, a wide awake and progressive real estate man of Klamath Falls, was born near the old Spanish grant on Sand creek, Tulare county, California, on March 9, 1873. Two years later he came with his parents to Wilderville, Josephine county, Oregon, and was raised on the farm, receiving a good education from the public schools of Josephine county. Also he studied three years in a private high school conducted by Prof. John H. Robinson. He was contented to remain on the farm until he reached life's majority, at which time he assumed responsibilities for himself, taking up mining as his first venture. He operated on the Illinois river in his home county and succeeded in locating some fine old channel diggings and worked on the same for two years successfully. He was variously engaged until 1900, when he selected Klamath Falls for a business point and came here in charge of a large band of cattle which he took to Fort Klamath and sold. He engaged in the mercantile business there for a while, then sold out and located in the town of Klamath Falls. At first he opened a butcher shop but sold the same in 1903 and engaged in real estate and insurance and is now handling a very excellent business. He is the agent for the Mutual Life Insurance Company and has made a marked success in that line. Mr. Burns is an up-to-date man, full of energy and believes in going right after business, which is the secret of his success. He is a genial man, social and kindly disposed and the result is, he has won many friends. His close application to business and perseverance, backed by good natural ability, have brought him the business he has sought for and he is considered one of the most successful men of the town. In political matters, Mr. Burns is a Democrat and takes a keen interest in the campaigns as well as in every movement that tends to build up the country. Although his residence has not been so long in Klamath county as some of the pioneers yet he has so thoroughly identified himself with its interests that no work purporting to mention the leading men could with impunity omit his name. He has accumulated a nice property both in Klamath Falls and in farm holdings and is one of the well to do men of the country.

The father of our subject is Francis G. Burns, a distant relative of the noted poet Burns, and was born in Ohio, whence he removed to Michigan, where he received his education. At the age of seventeen he crossed the plains to Tuolumne county, California, and engaged in placer mining, which occupied him for some time. Later, he married Miss Caroline, the daughter of James and Susan Woody, pioneers of Oregon. Later he and his wife removed to Grant's Pass, Oregon, where they now reside. They are parents of the following named children: Sarah L., James T., Mark L., who is our subject, Robert G., Wiley, Mary J., Caroline, Frank, William J., John S., and Harvey. The last named one is deceased.

At Grant's Pass, Oregon, on February 25, 1894, Mr. Burns married Miss Emma S. Longenbaker, the daughter of John and Margaret Longenbaker, natives of Germany, who came to this country before the Civil war. Mr. Longenbaker is a veteran of that struggle and now resides at Grant's Pass, Oregon. To Mr. and Mrs. Burns, the following named children have been born, Lena M., Raymond L., Elsie M., John F., Albert, Caroline and Marie.

Mr. Burns is a member of the K. O. T. M. and in that as in everything else he undertakes, he is an enthusiastic and ardent worker. He and his wife are highly esteemed people and have many friends in the places where they have dwelt.

JOSEPH M. MOORE was born in Wasco county, Oregon, on June 29, 1857, and now resides in Klamath Falls, Oregon. His father, Joseph Moore, was a native of Muncie, Indiana, and crossed the plains in 1850, locating near Walla Walla, Washington, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He later removed to Wasco county and then to Red Bluff, California. In 1883 he journeyed with his family to Klamath county, and located in Poe valley, taking a homestead. It is claimed that he raised on that place the first wheat ever grown in Klamath county. He made his home there until recently, when he removed to Fresno, California, and there he expects to dwell. He is seventy-six years of age and devotes much time and attention to church work and does some preaching. He is a member of the Methodist church and a devout and earnest Christian. Our subject's mother was a native of Tennessee and died in 1902, aged seventy-five. She also was an ardent and consistent Christian worker and an estimable and honorable woman. James M. Moore received his education in the common schools of Lakeport, California and came with his parents to Klamath county, where he took a homestead which he disposed of. He has been constantly engaged in freighting from different railroad points to the interior of Klamath and Lake counties for some fifteen years and he hauled the first load of freight from Pokegama to Klamath Falls.

On February 22, 1883, occurred the marriage of Mr. Moore and Mrs. Ella A. Wilson, at Cloverdale, California. Mrs. Moore was the daughter of Benjamin and Amanda Wilson, natives of Iowa. They followed farming and are now both deceased. Mrs. Moore died at Red Bluff, California, in 1893, leaving two children, Joseph B. and Lena Campbell, who are now both deceased. Mr. Moore owns considerable valuable property in Klamath Falls and is a citizen of influence and excellent standing. He has many warm friends and is known as a good man.

ISAAC W. BURRISS, proprietor of the Linkville Hotel at Klamath Falls, is one of the leading citizens of the town. His house is a favorite with the traveling public and is known as one of the best places of entertainment of the county. It is a commodious structure, with a fine dining room, office, bar and so forth, with plenty of sleeping apartments. Mr. and Mrs. Burriss are skillful and up-to-date hotel people and have made themselves very popular with all.

Isaac W. Burriss was born in Paris, Missouri, the son of Isaac and Eliza A. (Foreman) Burriss. The early progenitors of the family were Welsh people. Three brothers came to the colonies and settled in Virginia. They were patriotic and staunch men and did their part to make this country free. The father learned the trade of the hatter, then removed from Virginia to Kentucky, and later returned to Virginia. He finally came to Paris, Missouri, where he died a few months before our subject was born. The mother was born in Virginia and was married in Kentucky and after the death of her first husband, married A. L. Chapman, a blacksmith. He came to California in 1859 and two years later returned to Missouri and in 1852 took his family across the plains with ox teams in company with Lane brothers, who became famous and wealthy miners in California. They settled in Stockton, California, and in 1854 went to Andrews county, later to Solano county and finally to Santa Clara county. There he remained until his death in 1902, being then ninety years of age. He was one of the prominent pioneers of California and was a Knight Templar Mason. Mrs. Chapman is still living in Santa Clara county, in her ninetieth year. Our subject was the only child born to the first marriage. To the second were born Mrs. Fannie Horn, Mrs. Lucy Lane, Mrs. Mattie A. Proctor, and Mrs. Susan Lampkin of Santa Clara, and Asa, deceased. When a mere lad, our subject began prospecting, but made his headquarters at his home. In 1863 he went to the Boise Basin and made some money. He then returned to California and engaged in farming. In 1872, he went to Modoc county, California, and took up the sheep business, having over two thousand head. The hard winter following swept away all his sheep. During that time the Indians were on the war-path and he had much fighting in company with the soldiers, to subdue the savages. Later, our subject returned to Bakersfield, California, and engaged in the sheep business. He was successful and operated in the various places in the state until 1879 when he closed out the business and came to Ashland, Oregon. There he did business about twenty years and in 1901, he came to Klamath Falls and took charge of the Hotel Linkville, which he has operated since. Mr. Burriss has a one hundred and sixty acre farm near Merrill besides other property. On February 29, 1883, at Ashland, Oregon, Mr. Burriss married Miss Fracina Erb, who was born in Illinois. She crossed the plains with her parents in 1864. Three children are the fruit of this union, Warren E., Lois E. and Hazel.

Mr. Burriss is a member of the I. O. O. F., the encampment and A. O. U. W. He is one of the early pioneers of the Pacific coast and is intimately acquainted with all that country besides having endured much personal hardship in those early days. By way of reminiscence, we note that in 1854 he purchased a hat from a Mexican which he wore several years and then preserved as a relic, having it still, as much history is connected with it.

PRESS OF WASCO, SHERMAN, GILLIAM, WHEELER, CROOK, LAKE AND KLAMATH COUNTIES.

A most potential force is a well-written, lively, up-to-date country newspaper. True, the journalist who strenuously labors for the best interests of his locality and the general good of humanity, is, as a rule, poorly compensated for his toil and effort. But he stands for something; he represents something tangible; he poses in no reflected light; he is, perforce, compelled to have opinions of his own and, oftentimes, he gives them free ventilation; but he is several pegs ahead of the colorless, negative, non-trenchant money-grabber, bounded by the narrowest social horizon of any man on earth. The daily laborer on a daily newspaper—or weekly—will perchance, find himself beset by hornets and made the victim of bitter revilings. But he who has no enemies has few friends, and in the long run the average country editor is proven in the right as a progressive and hustling advisor. Quite often the pioneer journalist is editor, compositor, reporter and pressman. Once each week must his paper appear, as a rule on time, even though the overburdened toiler is compelled to work eighteen or twenty hours a day. Never must he neglect to accord full meed of praise where praise is due; if he fearlessly administers rebuke where rebuke is merited, he is likely, north, south, east or west, to be suddenly and unexpectedly confronted by the proverbial "bad man with a gun."

But the theme of editorial routine is, in these early days of the Twentieth Century, a trifle trite and threadbare. His weal and woe are more familiar to the reading public than they were in the times of old, when even a tinge of mysterious romance clung to the smut-stained, inky printer's devil. Even country weekly journalism is, nowadays, a hard, matter-of-fact, business proposition, requiring that wonderful combination of financial, literary, diplomatic, mechanical and, eftsoons, pugilistic genius. We come now to chronicle the varied histories of the newspapers within the counties mentioned above.

WASCO COUNTY.

April 1, 1859, the first newspaper in Eastern Oregon made its appearance at The Dalles. This was The Dalles Journal. It was established by Captain Thomas Jordan, then in command of the garrison at Fort Dalles. Mrs. Lord states that this semi-official journal was "edited by two educated soldiers," and it is to be presumed that they, also, set the type. One year subsequent to the appearance of the Journal, April 1, 1860, the plant was purchased by W. H. Newell, and the name changed to The Mountaineer. Of Editor Newell, Mrs. Lord says:

Mr. Newell was an able writer, but extremely deaf. His office was on the corner of Main and Union streets, opposite and west of the new Columbia hotel, where Victor Trevitt owned store rooms with those high, square fronts.

One day there was a very high wind, and this being an exposed corner, the wind caught the front of the printing office and whirled it away. Some one seeing it go ran over to the office. There stood Mr. Newell composing and "setting up" his editorials at the same time, which was his habit, as he seldom wrote them first. They shouted to him:

"Don't you see the front of your office has blown off?"

He replied in the quietest tone imaginable:

"Well, well; I thought I heard something."

I want to explain that the ground where those buildings stood has caved away, and Mill Creek has cut down so much that it looks nothing like the original place.

In 1862 The Mountaineer was issued daily and so continued until June 23, 1866, when the weekly edition only was printed. These four successive years of daily journalism in the history of The Mountaineer comprised a period of most exciting mining operations in Idaho. It was in 1866 that Mr. Newell was succeeded by Messrs. Cowne & Halloran, who assumed charge of the columns of the paper. In 1867 Mr. W. M. Hand purchased The Mountaineer and continued at the helm until his death, September 19, 1881, aged forty-seven years. During Mr. Hand's proprietorship of the paper he labored assiduously to build-up and develop the country. He was a man loath to give offense to any one, and so conducted his journal that it incurred no man's enmity. By his genial affability in business affairs he won a large circle of friends.

A stray copy of The Mountaineer, printed May 12, 1869, shows it to be a six-column folio. The running head-line reads "Vol. IX. No. 34." Following the death of Mr. Hand The Mountaineer passed into possession of a joint stock company by which it was published a short time only. Colonel T. S. Lang was the editor, in which position he continued until its consolidation with The Dalles Times. This event took place August 14, 1882. We will now consider the history of the Times which was established April 27, 1880, by R. J. Marsh and John Michell. At its inception it was a seven-column folio, Republican in politics. Its salutary appeared April 27th:

With this issue appears Volume 1, Number 1, of The Weekly Times, a journal devoted to the interests of the community, and the publishers by their honest and earnest endeavors to promote the welfare of Wasco county, hope and expect to receive a share of the public patronage. We do not think this is asking too much of the citizens of our county as we intend to make The Times a live paper, taking note of everything in our columns which may be of importance and interest to the whole county in which we have lived for nearly fifteen years, and thus giving our readers an equivalent for their patronage.

In politics The Times will be Republican because the predilections of the publishers are in that channel.

* * * To the newspaper fraternity in general we shall try to be courteous and gentlemanly.

MARSH & MICHELL,
Editors and Publishers.

From the first The Times was successful, financially, and the publication was an excellent one. In a trifle over a year a new press was installed; increasing patronage demanded an enlarged paper. June 1, 1881, it appeared as an eight column folio.

In July, 1882, R. J. Marsh disposed of his interest in the printing business, and on the 18th inst. he left The Dalles. Mr. Michell then became sole publisher and shortly afterward The Times was consolidated with The Mountaineer, and he became publisher of The Times-Mountaineer, a nine-column folio. August 19th the paper said:

This issue is the first since the consolidation of The Times and The Mountaineer under the editorship of John Michell. We are too well known to our readers to require any extended introduction in assuming editorial management of The Times-Mountaineer. In politics, as heretofore, we shall be Republican, but shall criticise the actions of members of our party as well as those of the opposition. * * * * Our constant aim will be to make The Times-Mountaineer a medium of news, local and general.

The Times-Mountaineer became a nine-column folio. The original press of this paper was an old Potter press, and was brought here from San Francisco, California, and on which the Alta-Californian, the first paper in California, was printed.

The first issue was an evening paper, but it was at once changed to a morning edition. This it will be remembered, was the second time the paper was issued as a daily. September 1, 1895, J. H. Douthit bought The Times-Mountaineer, and continued as editor and publisher until its suspension. November 30, 1900, The Daily Times-Mountaineer suspended. The editor said:

For five years the present management has endeavored to make The Daily Mountaineer a welcome visitor to its many readers, and we believe our efforts have been appreciated, but we do not feel justified in continuing the publication of a daily paper at a loss. To the many patrons of The Daily Mountaineer we desire to express our appreciation of their patronage and request that it be extended to the Weekly Times-Mountaineer.

November 12, 1901, The Times-Mountaineer began the publication of a semi-weekly edition, a six-column folio published Tuesdays and Fridays, until its suspension, September 30, 1904, when the following valedictory appeared, written by Editor Douthit:

This is the last issue of The Times-Mountaineer under the present management, and probably the last paper that will ever be issued under the above name. Conditions are such that I have found it impossible to continue further the publication of the paper.

For three years past The Times-Mountaineer has been losing money, and the drain has been such as to consume former accumulations. The party holding a mortgage on the plant has insisted on a settlement and the only means of settlement is to turn the plant over to the mortgagee.

September 1, 1895, I bought and assumed the publication of The Times-Mountaineer, and during the past nine years it has been my endeavor to publish a paper in the interest of The Dalles and Wasco county. How far such efforts have succeeded only the reader can judge. It has been my aim to give my patrons the worth of their money, and at the same time to help build up the community.

To those who have given the paper a loyal support, I desire to say that their support has been appreciated, and I thank them for it. And while I am forced to say good-bye to my readers, I assure them that it is with the profoundest regret that this step is necessary.

J. A. DOUTHIT.

And so passed out of existence the oldest paper in Eastern Oregon, the paper which, as The Mountaineer had been greeting the people of Wasco county, daily, semi-weekly or weekly, for over forty years. At the time of its suspension it was a semi-weekly, six-column folio. The editors of this paper had been successively Captain Jordan, W. H. Newell, Lieutenant Halloran, Lieutenant Catley, Henry Miller, George B. Curry, Colonel Thomas L. Lang, John Michell and J. A. Douthit. Among its correspondents it had had Joaquin Miller, Minnie Myrtle Miller, M. Aubrey Angelo and other well-known literary celebrities on the Pacific coast.

However, the second paper to be published in Wasco county was the one named The Weekly, which was issued a short period in 1860, at The Dalles. Comparatively little of its history can be traced. The third paper to live up times at The Dalles, but one of which very little can be learned, was the Daily Journal, published during the "boom" mining times of 1863-4-5. It was a five-column folio and Democratic in politics. It is thought that, for a time at least, its editor was Hubert Bancroft, the historian.

October 28, 1875, M. H. Abbott issued The Dalles Tribune and continued at the head of the paper until July 7, 1877, when it was discontinued, and the plant removed to La Grande. It was a six-column folio, a weekly, the fourth paper in The Dalles, and was democratic in politics.

The fifth paper to be published at The Dalles was the Inland Empire. Its publication was commenced July 6, 1878, and was suspended December 10, 1880. Its editor, Mr. T. B. Merry, was an able writer and well known throughout Oregon and the whole Pacific coast. He became the first editor of the Sunday Oregonian of Portland. It was a seven column folio and politically democratic.

The Wasco Weekly Sun was presented to the public of The Dalles June 4, 1881, with T. Draper as editor. Subsequently it fell under the management of C. Y. Draper, and August 1, 1882, it passed into possession of Lang & Marsh, with Mr. Thomas S. Lang as editor. It rapidly grew in popular favor and assumed a prominent position in the political and historical affairs of Wasco county. April 23, 1884, the daily edition suspended publication. Mr. Floed was for a period editor of the journal, but he severed his connection with it and returned to his home in Roseburg. He was succeeded by Professor W. S. Worthington, and the latter's successor in the editorial chair was Colonel T. S. Lang. January 23, 1884, the Sun plant was damaged by fire to the extent of $500. January 1, 1887, The Times-Mountaineer said:

T. S. Lang, Esquire, who has been the soul and brains of the Sun since it passed under its present management, severed his connection with that paper last Wednesday. As a writer on political economy he was a forcible advocate of protective tariff, and never missed an opportunity to speak in favor of this doctrine. In his articles on stock and agricultural industries he displayed a practical knowledge possessed by few, and in his advocacy of internal improvements was on the side of the people. The paper did not state on whom the mantle of editor would fall, but we presume this will appear in due time.

April 15, 1887, articles of incorporation of The Dalles Publishing Company were filed with the clerk of Wasco county. The object of this incorporation was the publication of The Sun. The capital stock was placed at $4,000, divided into 400 shares, no one person being permitted to subscribe for more than five shares. The names of the incorporators were: George H. Knaggs, O. S. Savage, N. H. Gates, R. F. Gibbons, J. L. Story, J. H. Jackson, George Herbert and A. S. Bennett. In October of this year the Sun was sold to certain representatives of the Democratic party. In September, 1890, F. C. Middleton assumed editorial charge of the Sun. He had been preceded by Mr. Morgan. Mr. T. H. Ward followed Mr. Middleton as editor, and his valedictory appeared May 20, 1891. He was succeeded by George P. Morgan. The latter resigned in Sep-ember of the same year. Meanwhile the paper was published by Campbell brothers. January 6, 1882, we find that Mr. Morgan had again become editor and business manager of the paper. In February, of that year Campbell Brothers severed their connection with the Sun as publishers. November 5th, we are informed James W. Armsworthy began editing the Sun. In March, 1893, D. C. Ireland accepted the management of the Wasco Sun. The paper, however, never resumed publication after the great flood of 1894. Mr. Ireland was the last editor of the paper.

The Oregon Democratic Journal came into The Dalles journalistic field October 2, 1884, with M. H. Abbott as editor. It went out of existence in the latter part of the year 1885. With Mr. Abbott was associated Charles Craig.

The Trade Journal with Mr. T. J. Simpson as editor made its appearance April 2, 1896. This paper, it was claimed, was placed in the field for political purposes and was continued only three or four months.

In March, 1889, appeared at The Dalles, Volume 1, Number 1, of the Economist, published by Dr. Wingate, and issued as the organ of the American Progressive League. This was a monthly, printed in The Times-Mountaineer office, and was in form a four column octavo. It was continued about one year.

In 1890 the only paper published in The Dalles, a city then of 5,000 inhabitants, was the daily and semi-weekly Chronicle. Alone it occupied a field in which so many periodicals had been born, only to pass away in periods of time ranging from a few weeks to forty-five years. The Chronicle was born December 10, 1890. It was put on its feet by a stock company and was a result of a municipal fight concerning the water question. J. H. Cradlebaugh was the first editor. At the time of its organization the principal stockholders of the company were: D. M. French, J. W. French, Robert Mays, B. F. Laughlin, W. Lord, Max Vogt, Hugh Glenn, A. C. Nicholson, A. S. McAllister, S. L. Brooks. The capital stock was $5,000, of which the five incorporators, D. M. and J. M. French, Mays, Brooks and McLaughlin, subscribed $500 each. The initial manager of the paper was B. F. Laughlin. It opened for business as an evening daily. For a period Mr. Cradlebaugh was editor, and he was succeeded by Mr. Hugh Gourlay, who printed his salutatory February 26, 1891. It appears that D. C. Ireland was editor of the paper for awhile, resigning early in the year 1893, and accepting the editorial management of the Wasco Sun. Since its event the editors of The Dalles Chronicle have been: J. H. Cradlebaugh, Hugh Gourlay, D. C. Ireland, S. L. Brooks, F. W. Wilson, J. H. Cradlebaugh, R. J. Gorman, Miss Rose Michell, Hugh Gourlay, Miss Rose Michell, John Michell, and, again, Miss Rose Michell, the present editor.

The publication of the Hood River Glacier, a seven-column weekly, was begun in June, 1889, by Judge George T. Prather. The earlier issues were edited by John H. Cradlebaugh, and the paper was printed in the office of the Sun, at The Dalles. At its inception it was a five-column journal. In September of that year Mr. Cradlebaugh secured a printing plant and permanently established the Glacier at Hood River, enlarging the paper to a six-column folio. Mr. Cradlebaugh continued in possession of the Glacier until July, 1894, when the paper was purchased by Samuel F. Blythe. A six-column folio with patent outside, continued to meet the demands of the community until August, 1899, when the paper was enlarged to seven-columns. In 1902 the Glacier was published by S. F. Blythe & Son.

May 1, 1904, Arthur D. Moe purchased the Glacier and changed it to a seven-column quarto, all home print. In January, 1905, he installed a simplex type-setting machine, and now has the most complete office and publishes the best and largest weekly newspaper in Wasco county.

Arthur D. Moe was born in Princeton, Wisconsin, August 31, 1865, and attended the public schools at Beaver Dam, that state. In 1881 he was inducted into the printing business at Princeton, and continued there until 1891, when he went to St. Paul, Minnesota, and started the South St. Paul Daily Reporter, which he sold to Swift & Company in 1892. He then went to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and with W. Murphy, of the Minneapolis Tribune, bought the Daily Plaindealer. On May 1, 1904, Mr. Moe purchased the Hood River Glacier and is still editor and publisher.

The Glacier is exclusively a paper for Hood River. It aims chiefly to furnish its patrons with a resume of local happenings, served in a style that makes it all wholesome reading matter, and with the intention to give outsiders a truthful pen picture of what Hood River offers to the industrious home seeker. The paper is read by nearly every one in the valley, and offers an excellent advertising medium through which to reach the attention of Hood River people.

Under the management of the Blythes the Glacier was, politically independent. When Mr. Moe assumed charge it became a Republican journal. The Glacier is the only paper ever published in Hood River, with the exception of the Sun, and which was only for a brief period.

The Baptist Sentinel was established at The Dalles in 1894 by Reverend Miller, then pastor of the Baptist church at that place. It was a religious journal and was continued until 1897, when it was removed to North Yakiina.

In the latter part of April, 1894, the Reformer was first issued at The Dalles and continued in existence about a year. This was an organ of the People's Party, and edited by H. D. Joey. January 9, 1897, The Dalles Chronicle commented thus on the demise of another ambitious organ at The Dalles.

"The Dispatch is dispatched, turning up its little toes this morning. There never was room for it here; in fact there is not room for the papers already here, and that it was doomed to an early death every person who knows anything of newspapers was well assured. * * * Miller made a hard struggle to keep it going, but it was a task neither he nor any one else could accomplish in The Dalles under present conditions."

G. J. Miller the editor, conducted the paper about six months. The Dispatch was a daily, and Republican in politics.

The Hood River Sun, a seven-column folio, weekly, published at first by Sloan P. S. Schutt, rose on the journalistic horizon in 1899. Mr. Schutt three weeks later sold it to E. R. Bradley. The paper lingered several months when it was discontinued and Mr. Bradley confined his attention to a job office.

November 28, 1891, the material for a new paper, the Dufur Dispatch arrived at The Dalles. Mr. Brooks, the prospective editor, removed this plant from Monmouth to Dufur. Shortly afterward the paper was issued, a seven-column folio, and it was filled with interesting local news. In his salutatory Editor Brown said: "It will be a country paper, giving its attention mostly to Dufur and vicinity, kindly permitting the president and congress to run the United States; Democratic by proclivity, and independent by force of circumstances."

The Dufur Dispatch was continued for about a year when it was discontinued. Then Dufur was without a paper until the spring of 1896. At that time H. S. Turner moved a plant to Dufur, and May 8, 1896, he issued the first number of his paper which he called, also, the Dispatch, and headlined the paper Volume 2, No. 1, thus making it a continuation of the Brooks publication. It was a six-column folio, enlarged November 26, 1897, to seven columns. In October, 1898, Mr. Turner began the publication of a daily. January 6, 1899, he disposed of his interest in the Dispatch to A. J. Douglas, and the daily edition was discontinued. Under the new ownership Mrs. Edith Douglas became editor. May 2, 1899, Hisler & Temple became the publishers and December 22d, the same year, the property was disposed of to Henry Menefee. September 1, 1901, the Dispatch was purchased by Charles H. Reed, and February 27, 1903, it was enlarged to a six-column quarto. For some time previous four pages had been "patent," and this is the form in which it is now issued. March 1st the publishing firm became Reed & Shepherd. February 24, 1905, Mr. Reed purchased his partner's interest and is now sole publisher of the paper. The Dufur Dispatch is a neat little paper, loyal to the town in which it is published and the town is loyal to the paper.

The only newspaper in southern Wasco county is the Antelope Herald, published by Max Luddemann. It has an extensive field and is prosperous. It was established July 22, 1892, by E. M. Schutt; a six-column folio. It was, politically, independent. October 29, 1897, Mr. Schutt disposed of the Herald to M. E. Miller and went to Heppner where he started another journal. During the summer of 1898 Max Luddeman took the Herald over from Mr. Miller. This was shortly after the fire at Antelope. September 29, 1899, E. C. Goodwin became associated with Mr. Luddemann in the publication of the Herald, the firm name being Luddemann & Goodwin. November 1, 1900, the partnership was dissolved, Mr. Goodwin retiring. In the spring of 1905 the Herald was increased in size to a seven-column folio. H. G. Kibbee purchased the Antelope Herald of Max Luddemann and is now acting as editor and business manager.

One attempt only has been made to publish a journal in Antelope in opposition to the Herald. This was the Republican the initial number of which was issued in July, 1900, by A. M. F. Kircheiner. The Republican suspended in October, 1901.

In April, 1900, the plant of the Moro Leader was purchased and shipped to Shaniko. Arthur Kennedy, of The Dalles took charge of the journal, William Holder being the owner. The new Shaniko Leader made its appearance April 10, 1900. The paper suspended publication in 1902, and the plant was removed to Crook county. This was the only newspaper ever published in Shaniko.

The latest paper to make its appearance in Wasco county is the Tygh Valley Bee, established in April, 1905, by E. O. Shepherd, formerly one of the proprietors of the Dufur Dispatch. The Bee is a four-column quarto.

SHERMAN COUNTY.

Four weekly newspapers are being published in Sherman county at the date of writing. They are the Sherman County Observer, published at Moro by D. C. Ireland & Son; the Wasco News of Wasco, by J. W. Allen; the Grass Valley Journal, of Grass Valley, by W. I. Westerfield, and the Kent Recorder, at the little village of Kent, by E. H. Browns. There is, also, a quarterly, The Occidental Magazine and Parishioner's Guide, a Catholic publication edited by Rev. M. J. Hickey, and printed at the office of the Wasco News. Consequently the press history of Sherman county is not very extended, although there have been a number of other papers published within its limits in addition to those mentioned above. While their numbers have been small the history of each is quite interesting from a journalistic view point owing to the many changes in ownership and the different places in the county from which the same papers have been issued.

Sherman county's first paper was the Wasco Observer, established at Wasco November 2, 1888. It is still published as the Sherman County Observer, at Moro, the county seat. During the later '80's that portion of Wasco county lying between the John Day and Des Chutes rivers, had become settled by a population of thrifty stockmen and farmers, and in 1888 the question of forming a new county was one exciting considerable animation. A few small towns and trading points had sprung up and the population of what, a little later, became Sherman county, had reached about 1,400. Yet there was no newspaper within the proposed boundaries of the new county, and few are the counties created without the advantageous assistance of a newspaper published within its borders. This condition led to the establishment of the Wasco Observer. Its first issue was dated November 2, 1888; published by C. J. Bright and A. B. McMillan. The Observer was, politically independent, at its inception, but it became staunchly Republican when D. C. Ireland & Sons assumed charge. In April, 1889, Mr. Bright, being appointed school superintendent of the new county, the plant was turned over to Mr. McMillan, who conducted it until February, 1890, when the paper was sold to J. B. Hosford. He continued it until July, 1891, when he removed the plant to Moro. The journal then became the Moro Observer. Doubtless this change was made by Mr. Hosford under the belief that he would better his condition thereby. Moro was a growing prosperous town, and was without a paper. Indications at this time pointed strongly to the selection of Moro as the county seat at the election one year away. To the paper Moro promised liberal support. Following its removal to Moro C. E. Jones became interested with Mr. Hosford in the publication of the Observer, but in July, 1892, he retired and the paper was in the sole charge of Mr. Hosford. In November of that year the latter sold the paper that he might devote himself exclusively to the practice of his profession as a lawyer. For a short period the Observer appears to have been in charge of E. M. Shutt, as it is recorded that he retired June 1, 1892.

However, F. M. Bixby assumed editorial charge of the paper, succeeding Mr. Hosford in November, 1892. December 1st Mr. Hosford wrote:

"I desire to notify the readers and friends of the Observer that I have leased the paper to Mr. F. M. Bixby, a competent and enterprising journalist, who will donate all his time and talents to the management of said paper.

J. B. HOSFORD."

January 12, 1893, Mr. Bixby severed his connection with the Observer, and the paper was conducted for Mr. Hosford by Mr. Clyde Williams. June 7, 1894, appeared the following self-explanatory articles in the Observer:

With last week's issue my connection with the Observer ceased. I have disposed of the paper to Mr. D. C. Ireland, who is an excellent journalist, a talented writer and a gentleman who will take pleasure in aiding with his pen the development of eastern Oregon and Sherman county. The readers of the Observer may rest assured that under Mr. Ireland's management the columns of the paper will always be bright and newsy. I shall always feel a warm interest in the welfare of the Observer and in Sherman county, where I intend to continue in the practice of law. It is, of course, unnecessary, for me to solicit a continuance of your patronage for my successor, as the Observer will furnish in its own columns proof of his merit sufficient to entitle him to the support of all who appreciate a good newspaper.

Respectfully yours,

J. B. HOSFORD.

It may be stated in this connection that no change in the management of the paper is contemplated, so far as the political complexion is concerned. Mr. Hosford has trimmed the sails of the Observer and shaped its course to suit us, and we shall continue upon the lines marked out, producing as nearly a first-class family paper as our ability and business will justify. It shall be our constant endeavor to properly represent Sherman county at all times, and upon all occasions to assist in every laudable undertaking having the upbuilding of the Inland Empire in view, and a complete development of the wonderful resources of nature surrounding us, and for this purpose a cordial invitation is extended to all men of a progressive and enterprising spirit irrespective of political preferences, to make the Observer office frequent visits, to the end that we may become well acquainted with one another.

Very respectfully yours,
D. C. IRELAND.

Mr. Ireland then organized the firm of Ireland & Sons, C. L. and F. C., which continued until about 1898, when Ireland Brothers had charge of the paper for a short time. In September, 1901, C. L. Ireland secured a two-thirds interest in the Observer.

The term "Inland Empire" was originally applied to regions tributary to the Columbia and Snake rivers, by the "O. Man," (D. C. Ireland), in the Astorian, in his contention for an open river from Lewiston to the sea. In 1903 Mr. Ireland had been publishing papers in Oregon for 40 years, among other ventures having established the Astorian, of Astoria. The Sherman County Observer is an eight-column folio, all home print, independent in politics and all other matters. Since its establishment in 1888 it has taken a prominent part in all matters relating to Sherman county, and today is one of the leading papers of Eastern Oregon. D. C. Ireland is editor and C. L. Ireland, business manager.

Following the removal of the Wasco Observer to Moro in July, 1891, another plant was brought in and another paper took its place. The new comer was the Wasco News, published by J. M. Cummins, formerly of the Goldendale Courier, and Dr. H. E. Beers. This was Sherman county's second newspaper. In August, 1892, Mr. Cummins disposed of his interest in the News and removed to Centerville, Washington county, being succeeded by Frank M. Bixby, who continued with the paper four months. In November of that year the News became the property of James W. Armsworthy. Of this gentleman The Dalles Times-Mountaineer of January 1, 1898, said:

The well-known and popular editor of the Wasco News is one of those jovial, good fellows that it does one good to meet. His first work was on the old Observer, and he afterward completed his mechanical knowledge in Portland. Returning to Wasco in 1892, in November of that year, he bought the plant of the Wasco News, and by adding a complete job department to it, has today the most complete printing office in the county. The policy of his paper is of an independent character, and as he wields a facile pen and is well informed upon state and national affairs, his paper is sought after by the intelligent class of readers. He is, also, an indefatigable news gatherer, and no la-

In October, 1897, the News was published by Armsworthy & Brock, who made the paper a five-column quarto. In 1889 the Sherman County Bank took the paper under a chattel mortgage. Lucius Clark was the assignee appointed by the bank and, with the assistance of A. H. Kennedy, he edited the paper. February 15, 1900, Norman Draper purchased the plant and V. C. Brock was again placed in charge. In the spring of 1901 the News and People's Republic, of Moro, were consolidated, V. C. Brock continuing as manager and editor until April 1, 1902, when A. S. McDonald bought the paper. He conducted it about two months and then disposed of it to Pound & Morris, of Arlington. In the fall of 1903 G. E. Kellogg became the owner, conducting it until the spring of 1904, when it was sold to J. W. Allen and M. P. Morgan. Mr. Morgan retired about six months afterward and Mr. Allen assumed sole control and is the present owner and publisher of the paper.

The first edition of the Grant Dispatch was issued Saturday, December 16, 1892. It was published by W. H. Brooks, and the plant was the same used for one year in the publication of the Dufur Dispatch. It was the third paper published in Sherman county. In July, 1893, publication of the Dispatch was suspended. Another journalistic venture, however, was placed in the town of Grant. This was the Grant Gazette, edited by W. O. Maxwell, formerly of Goldendale. It was independent in politics; a kind of "boom" sheet, and the plant was washed away in the great flood of 1894, May 14th.

The first number of the Grass Valley Journal was thrown to the breeze November 12, 1897. Politically the new venture was independent Republican. C. E. Brown was editor, and the paper was owned by The Journal Publishing Company. It was a seven-column folio, "patent sides." It is the only journalistic venture ever made in Grass Valley (with the exception of the school paper), and has been successful. In July, 1898, we find that the Journal was issued by The Grass Valley Publishing Company. The capital stock was $2,000; C. E. Brown, George W. Bourhill and J. H. Smith were the incorporators, and William Holder, C. W. Moore and J. D. Wilcox the principal stockholders. In 1897 W. I. Westerfield came to Grass Valley and was employed by the publishing company to edit the Journal. At the expiration of a year he leased the plant, November 18, 1898. February 24, 1902, Mr. Westerfield purchased the paper and has since ably and suc-

March 2, 1898, the Moro Leader came into existence, issued by the Moro Publishing Company. The raison d'être for this move was that some of the businessmen of the county seat were dissatisfied with the Observer, or rather, some of the principles advocated by it. L. H. Hunting was editor of the Leader, an eight-column folio, politically Republican. As editor of the paper Mr. Hunting was succeeded by Mr. Fitzmaurice. Some time previous to the removal of the Leader to Shaniko, William Holder became the editor. This removal occurred in April, 1900, when the publication of the Shaniko Leader was begun. This left the Moro field exclusively to the Observer, and the Republic; the removal of the latter a short time later left the Observer the only journal in Moro.

So the Republic was taken away to Wasco in April, 1898. It became a seven-column folio, was attractive, typographically, and was ably edited by Mr. W. J. Peddicord, at that period county school superintendent. Politically it was a People's party organ and their only exponent of populism in Eastern Oregon. Its first issue was dated April 21, 1898. July 21 of the same year we find that Mr. Peddicord retires from the editorial chair. He was succeeded by F. E. Kellogg. The People's Republic was subsequently removed to Moro, making the third paper at the county seat. Here it was published until December, 1900. December 1st, of that year, The Dalles Times-Mountaineer said:

V. C. Brock, of Wasco, and F. E. Kellogg, of Moro, have formed a co-partnership for the publication of the two papers—the Wasco News and Moro Republic. Both papers will be printed at Wasco, though the Republic will maintain an office at Moro. It is their purpose to improve both papers so as to make them a necessity to the people of Sherman county.

These papers were finally consolidated and publication continued under the name of the Wasco News. And this was the last of the People's Republic.

In April, 1902, the plant of the Shaniko Leader was moved back to Moro and the Moro Bulletin was issued by William Holder. It was a six-column folio, politically Republican. Its form was soon changed to a seven-column folio and it continued that size until its suspension, November 21st of that year. This was the plant that had formerly been in commission at Moro in the publication of the Moro Leader, and which was removed to Shaniko in 1900.

"The X" was for nearly a year the official organ of the Middle Oregon Academy, at Grass Valley. It was devoted to educational subjects and was a worthy publication.

The first issue of the Kent Recorder was printed November 4, 1904, by Edward H. Browns. It is a seven-column folio, having commenced as a six-column folio. It was enlarged after a few issues were printed. The Recorder is the latest venture in Sherman county journalism.

GILLIAM COUNTY.

The press history of this part of the Inland Empire is, necessarily incomplete owing to the loss of many of such records as may have existed at one time. We must therefore, perforce, give only a skeletonized description of Gilliam county journalism.

The first that we hear of the Arlington Times is in the statement in The Dalles Times-Mountaineer of December 18, 1886, that the Arlington Enterprise was no more as it had been consolidated with the Inland Times, and would appear the next day as the Arlington Times. Mr. Orval Tucker was the editor and proprietor of the journal.

The first issue of the Arlington Town Talk was printed in February, 1889. It was edited by Harry Hawson and was rather a spicy sheet. May 4th, of that year we find that the paper suspended.

In July, 1894, the Riverside Enterprise was published at Alkali by M. C. Harris. Typographically the paper was neat and attractive one, and decidedly newsy.

In April, 1898, Robinson & Pound began the publication of the Arlington Review, a five column folio, which they conducted about a year and then disposed of the paper to W. A. Maxwell. Politically it professed to stand in the middle of the road, looking neither to the right or left, but devoting its attention strictly to purveying the news. April 14th Mr. Pound disposed of his interest to his partner who continued to conduct the paper.

From The Dalles Times-Mountaineer we learn that the Arlington Advocate was first published by Jayne & Shutt, November 11, 1890. In March, 1891, S. P. Shutt purchased the interest of A. A. Jayne in the Advocate and removed the plant to Condon, where it was issued as the Condon Globe. It appears that the Arlington Advocate was issued March, 1899, by R. H. Robinson who soon after sold the same to C. E. Hicks. Later in the year the name was changed to the Arlington Independent. In 1901 J. M. Johns purchased the Independent and consolidated it with the Record. The Independent had been a six-column folio. At the time of this merger C. E. Hicks was publisher of the Independent. It was a newsy, local paper, but the attempt to give it a footing in a field already covered by the Record was, evidently, a mistake.

The Arlington Record was founded in January, 1892, by John A. Brown. With the expiration of the first year it came into possession of J. M. Johns, January 6, 1893. He conducted the paper until October 10, 1895, and placed it on a paying basis. On the date mentioned he disposed of the property to W. A. Maxwell, formerly of Grant. Until January 1, 1900, Mr. Maxwell conducted the Record, when he sold it to the Record Publishing Company and Attorney S. A. D. Gurley became editor. July 28, 1900, J. M. Johns again purchased the plant. From a small "patent outside" the Record has grown to a seven-column folio, all home print. Politically it has always been Republican, but by no means a partisan organ.

The Arlington Appeal made its initial appearance February 26, 1903. It began in a small way as a four-column, four-page paper, and still continues the four-column make-up, but has enlarged to ten pages. Since its advent Mr. S. A. Thomas has been editor and proprietor. Its motto was "All Coin Looks Alike to Us." Mr. Thomas was formerly editor of the Ortonville, (Minn.) Journal. The salutatory "bow" of the Appeal was:

In establishing a newspaper it has been customary in all ages for the editor to make a statement of his intentions and the policy to be pursued by the paper. In establishing the Appeal it is not our intention to run any one out of town or business. It is with us, as with all other enterprises, a business proposition. We feel that the field is large enough to support another newspaper, and it will be our earnest endeavor to make the Appeal a newspaper in every sense of the word. In national and state politics the Appeal will be republican, while in county and municipal affairs we shall support those best qualified to fill the position, but we will endeavor to give the news regardless of politics, and can assure the public that we do not intend to publish a political sheet. To those who have placed their advertisements in our columns we shall always feel grateful and assure them that our efforts shall always be used in their behalf. The columns of the Appeal are always open for the discussion of any subject that is before the people.

It will be recalled by the reader that S. P. Shutt removed the plant of the Arlington Advocate to Condon, the capital of Gilliam county, and began the publication of the Condon Globe. This was in March, 1891. In his salutatory, published March 27th, Mr. Shutt said:

Realizing the fact that sooner or later Condon would have a newspaper of its own, and knowing equally well that no better location for a newspaper exists in Gilliam county, we have concluded to pitch our tent among you. Henceforth the Globe will be your friend. Its columns will be devoted to the general and local news of the day, which it will endeavor to give you faithfully and impartially. Editorially it will be independent, worshipping at no political shrine in particular, but honestly striving to promote the general good of Gilliam county and Eastern Oregon.

We solicit your patronage and support, confident that you will recognize both the advantage of having a newspaper in your midst and the necessity of helping to maintain it.

In February, 1898, the Globe plant passed into the hands of S. A. Pattison, who during the four years previous had published the Emmett (Idaho) Index. Mr. Shutt had conducted the Globe nearly seven years successfully, financially and otherwise. Editor Pattison announced his intention of conducting the paper as a non-partisan, non-sectarian, "local newspaper, and as a business proposition." March 31st the paper was enlarged from a six to a seven-column folio to take care of increasing patronage. December 1, 1904, it was again enlarged to a five-column quarto.

The initial number of the Condon Weekly Times was printed in July, 1900; a seven-column folio, edited by William Christie. It was issued by the Condon Publishing Company. Its editor announced that the paper would be impartial in county matters, but would favor the republican administration. In December, 1904, Mr. Christie left the Times and was succeeded by Edward Curran, who is at present editor and proprietor, having purchased the plant from the Condon Publishing Company.

CROOK COUNTY.

In the fall of 1880 John E. Jeffrey began the publication of the Ochoco Pioneer. This was the initial journal published in Prineville, the present capital of Crook county. It was a brisk, lively sheet and continued financially successful for some time when business depression compelled its suspension. As described by The Dalles Times the Pioneer was a "neatly printed, 7-column folio, independent in politics and devoted to the best interests of Wasco county," there being no Crook county at that early period.

In 1881 the Prineville News was issued under the management of Dillard & Company. It was independent in politics, with Republican inclinations. With the suspension of the Pioneer Prineville was without a paper for nearly a year, when the News was thrown to the breeze. While Horace Dillard was the projector of this venture he subsequently formed a partnership with D. W. Aldridge and under their control its publication was continued for several years. Saturday, November 11, 1883, the News suffered a loss by fire of about $1,500, although nearly all the material was saved except the press. The net loss was estimated at about $300.

In June, 1885, the city of Prineville was made lively by the appearance of the Ochoco Review with the names of Barnes & Douthitt as publishers. It was made bright and breezy by the editorial pen of George W. Barnes. We find that it had been a folio, but in July, 1887, it had blossomed into a quarto, just doubling its original size. In 1888 The Review was being published by J. A. Douthitt. From The Dalles Times-Mountaineer, of May 6, 1893, we learn that F. R. Willmarth had published his valedictory and retired to be succeeded by D. W. Aldridge. In August, 1894, the Ochoco Review and Prineville News were consolidated as one journal under the name of the Ochoco Review and the management of J. N. Williamson, formerly editor of the News. This left Crook county with only one newspaper, and with a claimed population of double that of Gilliam county. In October, 1895 the editorial control of this journal was handed over by Mr. Williamson to L. N. Liggett, a resident of Prineville. August 17, 1897, Mr. Liggett said:

With this issue the Prineville Review enters upon its fourth year and twenty-two months under the present management. During this time we have tried to give the news both general and local. How well we have succeeded its many readers can testify. In entering upon another year we can only reiterate what we have said on former occasions that we will work for the interests of Crook county and that the state at large and above all things will be non-partisan in politics.

The Review has the largest circulation of any other paper in the county and, hence, is eagerly sought after as an advertising medium. It is the official paper for Crook county in which all official notices are published. We take this opportunity to thank its many patrons for the liberal support they have given this paper in the past and hope to merit the same in the future.

In July, 1902, the Prineville Review again changed hands. Mr. L. N. Liggett had edited the journal six years, and now sold out to William Holder, publisher of the Shaniko Leader and Moro Bulletin. April 16, 1904, the Des Chutes Echo said: "A. H. Kennedy, formerly of this place, has purchased the Prineville Review of William Holder and is now sole proprietor of that publication."

In October, 1896, A. G. Palmer purchased the plant of the Mitchell Monitor and removed it to Prineville where it was known as the Crook County Journal. But in August, 1897, we find that Mr. Hugh Gourlay, of The Dalles, had taken charge of the Journal. July 23, 1898, the Prineville Review said of the Journal:

Mr. Hugh Gourlay informs us that he has issued the last number of the Crook County Journal under his management. Mr. H. J. Palmer, one of the Journal, was over last week and arrangements were made to turn the paper over to the owners, A. C. and H. J. Palmer, but as neither one appeared before this week's issue appeared no arrangements were made. In justice to Mr. Gourlay we will say that since he has taken hold of the Journal he has made a first-class paper out of it and it will revert back to the Palmer Brothers in a great deal better shape than when they delivered it over to Mr. Gourlay.

According to the Review of April 6, 1901, another change was made in the fortunes of the Journal:

The Journal came to hand this week with the name of W. T. Fogle as editor and publisher. He promises a great deal for his paper, and time will tell whether he can carry out his intentions. We hope the relationship between the Review and the Journal in the future will be of a different nature than it has been in the past. In the meantime the Review will remain under the same management that it has for over five years and still publish the best county newspaper in Crook county.

In November, 1901, Mr. Fogle sold a half-interest in the Crook County Journal to W. H. Parker, of Albany, Oregon, who had held the position of foreman on the Daily Herald of that city for nine years. Mr. Fogle remained as editorial writer; Mr. Parker having charge of the mechanical department. In June, 1902, the Journal was enlarged to a 12-page paper. In January, 1903, the Journal again changed hands, passing under the management of W. C. Black, and S. M. Bailey, the former assuming editorial charge. In April, 1903, Mr. Bailey disposed of his interest in the Journal to W. C. Black. In September of the same year an interest was purchased in the paper by D. F. Steffa, who became a resident of Prineville. But in January, 1904, we find that at some previous period the Journal was under the joint management of Steffa & Bailey, for in January of that year Messrs. Steffa & Bailey disposed of their interest and W. C. Black again resumed possession.

Volume I, Number I, of the Bend Bulletin appeared in March, 1903, with Max Luddemann as publisher and Don P. Rea as editor. It was a six-column quarto with "patent sides." In August of that year J. M. Lawrence purchased a half interest in the paper. In May, Mr. Rea withdrew from the editorial management with the intention of devoting himself to other interests. He was succeeded by J. M. Lawrence, a newspaper publisher of ability and experience.

In June, 1902, the Des Chutes Echo, published at Bend, Crook county, was the latest newspaper venture in the state. The paper was edited by A. C. Palmer. It was naively observed by the Grass Valley Journal that "Mr. Palmer has started his paper a little early in order to catch some of those always welcome to the printer, timber notices."

In July, 1903, there occurred a change in the ownership of the Echo. Up to that date H. J. and A. C. Palmer had judiciously managed the journal. On the above date they disposed of the plant to The Des Chutes Publishing Company, of which George Schlecht was the controlling factor. In July, 1903, the building, with the entire printing plant of the Echo was destroyed by fire. It was impossible to ascertain the origination of this blaze. Thenceforth for about a year the Echo was issued from the office of the Prineville Review. In July, 1904, it suspended publication. The Echo was in its third year, had enjoyed a good circulation and had been edited by George Schlecht at Des Chutes and, as stated, since the fire printed in the Review office. The editor, finding more lucrative employment elsewhere, decided to abandon the little paper and turned it over to the Review management. But the latter found it inexpedient to employ a writer at Des Chutes and having no time to look after the paper decided that the best thing to be done under the circumstances was to abandon the field to the Bend Bulletin.

In July, 1904, a six-column folio, all home print, called the Madras Pioneer, was started at Madras by the Pioneer Publishing Company. It was edited by Timothy Brownhill. April 1, 1905, the paper was purchased by Max Leuddemann. It was, then, a six-column folio, all home print, and conducted for Mr. Luddemann by S. D. Percival.

In 1904 the Cline Falls Press issued its first number. It was a four-column folio and entered at the Prineville postoffice. It appears to have been under the editorial supervision of B. F. Monger, and financed by F. T. Hurlburt, a banker of Shaniko.

The Ashwood Prospector was established March 30, 1901, by Max Luddemann, a five-column paper printed from the office of the Antelope Herald. This paper was discontinued in April, 1905.

LAKE COUNTY.

Three newspapers are being published in Lake county at the present time, the Lake County Examiner, of Lakeview, by C. O. Metzker; the Lakeview Herald, by William Wagner; and the Central Oregonian, of Silver Lake, by W. D. West. Besides these only three other papers have had an existence in the county.

The first paper started in Lake county, and the first in Southern Oregon east of the Cascade mountains, was the State Line Herald, which first greeted its subscribers at Lakeview in December, 1878. The plant upon which this paper was printed had formerly done duty in the publication of the Bidwell Herald at Fort Bidwell. That paper was edited by Fred Smith, one of the soldiers stationed at Fort Bidwell. When the troops were removed to another post the Herald suspended publication.

After the suspension at Fort Bidwell the plant was moved to Lakeview and relaunched as the State Line Herald. It was purchased from W. B. Ayer by C. B. Watson and W. W. Watson, who were the first publishers. The Herald at the start was a six-column folio, but was later enlarged to an eight-column paper. Later B. P. Watson, another brother, secured an interest and the firm name was "The Watson Bros." Of these brothers, B. P. is dead; C. B. is an attorney at Ashland, Oregon; and W. W. resides in Portland.

For the first two years of its life the Herald was a valuable piece of property. The pioneer paper saw many exciting times in Lakeview, and it is alleged that shooting at the editor was not an uncommon occurrence. However, the paper never failed to come out each week, except once, when the office was over the old Goos brewery, when fire destroyed both the brewery and the Herald office.

In the spring of 1881 C. B. Watson left Lakeview, and on March 16 the paper was sold by C. B. and W. W. Watson to J. H. Evans, at that time register of the Lakeview land office, the consideration being $700. August 11, of the same year, Mr. Evans sold to R. F. McConaughy, and he the same day to B. P. Watson, the consideration in each case being $898.70.

During the political campaign of 1882, there was a fierce campaign waged between the State Line Herald, which was a strong Republican organ, and the Lake County Examiner, which at that time was as strongly Democratic. The latter won and left the Herald without much support, and as the town was too small to properly support two papers, arrangements were made to leave but one paper in the field. The Examiner purchased the Herald's plant, subscription list, good will, etc., and Lake county's pioneer paper ceased to be.

Lake county's second newspaper was the Lake County Examiner, established at Lakeview early in 1880. In the fall of 1879, Lake county, then comprising the present Lake and Klamath counties, was strongly Democratic, and a number of leading Democrats decided to start a newspaper in opposition to the State Line Herald, a Republican paper, and the only one published in Southeastern Oregon. They organized a stock company, among the stockholders of which were S. P. Moss, M. T. Walters, A. F. Snelling, C. A. Cogswell, Bob Redding, William Tullock, T. N. Lofton and George T. Baldwin. They bought a plant at Adin, California, paying $2,000 for it, and, as it was in the dead of winter, they had to haul it in on bob-sleds. There was no road broke down the valley, and when the teams bringing the plant struck the south end of the lake, which was frozen, they took to the ice and slid the outfit the entire length of the lake, about forty-five miles.

The first week in January, 1880, the Lake County Examiner was established as a Democratic paper with Frank Coffin as editor and manager. It managed to hold its own against the opposition paper, and in 1882 enlarged its plant and its field of support by purchasing its rival. Shortly after this Bruce Allen bought an interest in the paper and conducted it until March, 1885, when W. F. Beach came to Lakeview and bought Allen out. Three months after this transfer S. C. Beach came to Lakeview and bought up a lot of outstanding stock from C. A. Cogswell. The publishing firm now became Beach & Beach, and the Examiner took on a look of prosperity. Under this management the paper was independent politically, but leaned heavily to the Republican party.

In 1890 or 1891 F. W. Beach sold his interest to S. C. Beach, and a year later William Townsend and A. Y. Beach bought S. C. Beach out. In 1892 Mr. Townsend was elected county judge, and shortly afterward A. Y. Beach bought Townsend's interest in the paper and ran it independent until the campaign of 1896, when it was made a Republican organ. In January, 1898, J. E. McGarry bought a half interest in the Examiner, and the publishers became Beach & McGarry.

On May 22, 1900, the fire which wiped out of existence the business portion of Lakeview, destroyed the Examiner plant, all that was saved being a job press, a little type and a small quantity of paper. From the time of the fire until October of the same year the paper was printed on the job press and issued as a three column, eight and ten-page paper. Then a new plant, including a cylinder power press, was put in and the Examiner became a five-column, eight page paper.

John E. McGarry died on November 17, 1902, and in May, 1903, A. Y. Beach bought from the administrator of the McGarry estate the half interest in the paper for $2,000. The next change in proprietorship occurred on March 10, 1904, when C. O. Metzker, who up to a short time before had been publisher of the Chewaucan Post, at Paisley, purchased the Examiner from Mr. Beach. Mr. Metzker has continued the paper in the same form and with the same political principles as under Mr. Beach.

The Examiner ever since its establishment, over twenty-five years ago, has been an active factor in the advancement of Lake county. Today it is one of the best known and most reliable papers in Southern Oregon. Its plant is up-to-date and is one of the most expensive ever put in a town the size of Lakeview.

It was fifteen years after the establishment of the Examiner before the next newspaper came into existence in Lake county. This was the Lake County Rustler, known since at various times as the Lakeview Register and the Lakeview Herald. It was during the fall of 1894 that agitation was begun for a second paper in Lakeview. The People's party had been gaining strength during the preceding years, and at the presidential election of 1892 had carried the county for General Weaver. It was the promised support from the members of this party that induced the establishment of the Rustler.

The plant of the John Day Living Issue, which paper had suspended some few months before, was purchased and the Lake County Rustler came into existence in January or February, 1895. Oliver & Baker were the publishers, the latter retiring a few months afterward, when J. C. Oliver became sole publisher. October 15, 1898, J. G. Walters leased the plant, changed the name to the Lakeview Register, and conducted it as a Democratic organ. At the expiration of Mr. Walters' lease, October 1, 1899, J. C. Oliver again took charge of the paper and rechanged the name to the Lake County Rustler.

On May 22, 1900, the Rustler was entirely destroyed by fire. For one or two issues thereafter the Rustler was gotten out on the job press saved from the Examiner plant. Then Mr. Oliver took his forms to Alturas, California, where he printed the paper, sending the edition to Lakeview to be mailed.

During the summer of 1900 Mr. Oliver interested C. B. Irvine, who furnished a second-hand printing plant against Oliver's subscription list and book accounts, and the Lake County Rustler was again issued from its own plant in Lakeview. Oliver & Irvine published the Rustler until Dec. 1, 1901, when W. J. Moore took up Mr. Irvine's half interest. Oliver & Moore continued at the helm until July 1, 1902, when Chas. A. Fitch purchased Mr. Oliver's interest. Moore & Fitch, in September of the same year, renamed their journal the Lakeview Herald. Mr. Fitch died on November 6, 1902, and W. J. Moore then assumed full control and published the Herald until September 8, 1904. On the latter date the plant was leased by William Wagner, and on December 15, of the same year, that gentleman became the proprietor. The Herald is Democratic.

The fourth paper to be established in Lake county and the first one in the county outside of Lakeview, was the Chewaucan Post, which for nearly four years was published in the little town of Paisley. The Post was founded on February 7, 1901, by C. O. Metzker, the present editor and proprietor of the Lake County Examiner. It was established as a six column folio and it was independent in politics.

On April 9, 1903, the Post was purchased by William Holder, who, at the time, was interested in several newspapers in Eastern Oregon. Under Mr. Holder's administration the Post was a Republican paper. May 24, 1904, Chas. H. Keith bought the Post and at once changed it to a five-column folio, with all of its pages printed at home, it having had two "patent" pages before this change. Mr. Keith continued to publish the paper until in December, 1904, when it suspended, and the plant again became the property of Mr. Metzker. The Post during its life was a potent factor in the development of Northern Lake county and deserves a large share of credit for the settling of the country in that vicinity.

In February, 1903, the looming up of a big list of timber notices which had to be published, the lands lying in the vicinity of Silver Lake, caused several newspaper men to cast longing glances in that direction. William Holder, who had formerly published the Shaniko Leader, and was at that time publishing the Prineville Review, associated himself with W. A. Bell, a U. S. commissioner at Prineville, and they started for Silver Lake with a plant. Bailey & Black, publishers of the Crook County Journal, published at Prineville, also gathered up a printing outfit and started for Silver Lake, at the same time, L. N. Kelsay, not knowing of the movements on foot for the establishment of a newspaper at Silver Lake, bought the Shaniko Leader from William Holder, and after getting out only a few issues at that place, he, too, headed for Silver Lake. The three plants arrived at Silver Lake within a few days of each other and their owners began making preparations for business.

Three newspapers in such a small town seemed like overdoing the thing, so Bailey & Black and Kelsay consolidated their plants and began the publication of the Central Oregonian, which first appeared on March 5, 1903, under the firm name of Bailey & Kelsay. In November of the same year the Central Oregonian absorbed the Bulletin, at which time the publishing firm became the Central Oregonian Publishing Company, L. N. Kelsay editor and manager. On August 5, 1905, W. D. West purchased the Central Oregonian and he is still the publisher.

In the history of the Central Oregonian we have told of the rush of newspaper men to Silver Lake. On the day following the launching of the Central Oregonian,—on March 6, 1903,—the Silver Lake Bulletin came forth under the proprietorship of Holder & Bell and with L. N. Liggett as editor and manager. In November of the same year, after the greater portion of the timber in the vicinity of Silver Lake had been thrown into a forest reserve, and filings thus prohibited, the Bulletin was consolidated with the Central Oregonian, the owners of the former taking a part ownership in the latter paper. The Bulletin was in existence thirty-eight weeks.

WHEELER COUNTY.

The weekly journals of Wheeler county are, as a rule, bright, newsy and up-to-date. Among the first publications was the Fossil Journal which was published in 1886. It was a sheet worthy the patronage of the citizens. Sloan P. Shutt was the publisher and it was edited by H. H. Hendricks. The Fossil Journal first appeared Friday, October 15, 1886.

In October, 1894, Bruce Smith, backed by a number of responsible people, placed a journal in the field, at Mitchell. This paper favored a new county seat, and it was the general opinion that Mitchell ought to support a good newspaper. November 30, 1894, the Condon Globe said:

"The first issue of Mitchell's new paper, the Monitor, reached our table last week. 'Rocky Mountain Smith,' the notorious temperance reformer (who tries to drink all the liquor himself in order to discourage others from drinking) and W. F. Magee, a school teacher over there, were partners until the first issue came out and in it their dissolution notice appears. 'Rocky' has hit the road again and the paper is now owned and managed by Mr. Magee. The first issue was, of course, edited by 'Rocky' and is filled up mainly by abuse of neighboring editors, some of them receiving flattering comments. We wish the paper success under its new management, but believe it will fall short of its main object—that of having a new county cut off—for a number of years yet, at least until the population and wealth justifies it."

In 1895 the Monitor came perilously near giving up the ghost, but just as it was about to yield up its existence, a Mitchell attorney, A. C. Palmer, came to the rescue and he became editor and publisher. In October, 1896, it was the opinion of the Condon Globe that the Mitchell Monitor had changed hands nearly every month since its establishment, and had finally pulled up stakes and moved to Prineville. Thereafter it was known as the Crook County Journal.

In March, 1900, we find the Wheeler County News, edited by E. M. Shutt, formerly of Antelope and Heppner, published at Twickenham. It was a crisp, newsy little paper and became quite an important factor in the interests of the town.

In June, 1900, Roy C. Irvine, a bright and experienced newspaper man from Independence, Polk county, assumed editorial charge of the Wheeler County News. Mr. Shutt withdrew in a graceful and well worded editorial, and the plant was turned over to Mr. Irvine. In November, 1900. Mr. Irvine sold the paper to J. E. Adamson. In his salutatory the latter said: "Where others have quit I have begun anew." In April, 1902, the Wheeler County News ceased to exist and its plant and subscription list passed into the hands of James Stewart, of the Fossil Journal.

But the News was not dead; only sleeping. In July, 1902, it was awakened and came out as a five-column journal with "patent insides." In 1903 J. E. Adamson again resumed charge of the Mitchell News, having purchased it from James S. Stewart to whom he had sold it a year previous.

In March, 1904, we find the Mitchell Sentinel in the field, a six-column folio published by the Sentinel Publishing Company, which in reality meant Helm & Gillenwater. Mr. Helm finally purchased the whole interest. In August, 1904, the Sentinel plant was washed away by a waterspout, but immediately replaced with an entirely new outfit. It still remained, politically, uncompromisingly Republican. In November, 1904, the Pacific Homestead said:

The leading Republican paper of Mitchell at the present time is The Sentinel, which was founded in the year 1894 by Hon. W. P. Gillenwater and A. Helm, as a six-column paper to be devoted to the interests and advancement of Southern Wheeler county. It is a bright, newsy sheet, well filled with interesting local news and has a good circulation in the surrounding country. The paper suffered somewhat of a mishap during the waterspout of last July in that town, the office and supplies being swept away by the angry waters and publication was suspended until September 1st, in order to allow the publishers to replace the lost apparatus. It has now appeared again as the local Republican organ, and with renewed activity on the part of the publisher. The paper is well patronized by citizens and merchants of the town and country, both as a newsy sheet and as an advertising medium. The Hon. W. P. Gillenwater died on April 11th of the present year, leaving Mr. Helm as sole proprietor of the paper.

In October, 1901, the first number of the Spray Courier made its appearance. It was a journal creditable to the editor Jesse Shelby, and the town in which it was published. In November the paper had passed into the hands of David E. Baxter, an able newspaper man who owned the lot and building.

KLAMATH COUNTY.

In Klamath county there are two newspapers, the Klamath Falls Express and the Klamath Republican, both published at the county seat. They are good papers and are doing much to advertise the county in which they are published.

Although the history of the press of Klamath county covers a period of over twenty years, there have been established in the county only four newspapers, all at the county seat. It was over a year after Klamath had been cut off from Lake county before the click of type was heard in Klamath land. The pioneer paper was the Klamath Weekly Star, which first greeted its readers May 10, 1884, the plant from which it was issued having been brought from Etna, Siskiyou county, California, where it had formerly done service for the Etna Post. The Star was started as a six-column folio, all home print, and was very much devoted to Klamath county and the little town of Linkville. The founders of this pioneer newspaper were Joseph A. Bowdoin and a Mr. Curtis, the firm name being Bowdoin & Curtis. These gentlemen had been partners in the newspaper business elsewhere, and while they started the Star as partners, Mr. Bowdoin had sole charge of the Linkville paper and Mr. Curtis was never in the town. August 1, 1885, the partnership was dissolved and Mr. Bowdoin became sole publisher.

Every one who was in Klamath county prior to the establishment of the Star remembers how much people, who could not often come to town, wished to know of the happenings of the county, and how warmly the few business men talked about having a paper to advertise in, and thus keep the business relations with their patrons a little closer. Notwithstanding this good will of the people toward the paper, owing to the sparsely settled condition of the county at that time, the prospect was far from flattering, but the indomitable will power of Mr. Bowdoin, coupled with his business ability, overcame the difficulties and he conducted the venture to a successful issue. Mr. Bowdoin died February 14, 1904.

Mr. Bowdoin was a Democrat in politics, but he conducted the Star as an independent and strictly neutral paper, although he allowed its columns to be used for the free discussion of all political questions. The patronage of the paper increased and on June 1, 1886, it was enlarged to a seven-column folio. Another change was also made on this date. The name of the publication was changed from Klamath Weekly Star to Klamath County Star.

In July, 1889, J. A. Bowdoin retired from the Star, selling to his son, W. E. Bowdoin. A few weeks later, on September 6, 1889, the plant was destroyed by fire which wiped out almost the entire town of Linkville. A new outfit was at once purchased and publication continued.

September 5, 1890, Mr. Bowdoin sold an interest in the Star to P. J. Connolly, who for a year previous had been editing the paper. Mr. Connolly, who was known as "Peter the Poet," by the newspaper fraternity, was a gifted writer and his articles were copied extensively. Under Bowdoin & Connolly the publication became a strong Republican organ and took an active part in county politics. During three years the Star was one of the best country papers ever published in Oregon and was a credit to the Klamath country.

The firm was dissolved on September 18, 1894, and Mr. Connolly became sole publisher and proprietor. It then became an ardent advocate of the principles of the People's party, which at that time was very strong in Klamath county, and it remained an organ of that party until its suspension. Mr. J. K. Haynes became associated with Mr. Connolly in the publication of the paper in January, 1895, the latter, however, retaining the ownership of the plant. Financial troubles overtook the Star in the fall of 1895 and in September of that year an attachment was placed upon the plant. Mr. Connolly was forced to retire and for a few weeks the paper was issued by Mr. Haynes. On October 31, the last issue was printed and the Star was no more.

The plant, subscription list and other accounts were purchased by the express. The plant did duty for a short time in the publication of the Independent at Klamath Falls, but in July, 1896, it was shipped to Sisson, California, and was used in the publication of a paper at that point.

On April 28, 1892, appeared the first number of the Klamath Falls Express, the second publication to come into existence in the county of Klamath. The Star at this time was a strong Republican organ and the Express was established in the interests of the Democratic party of Klamath county, and it filled the bill admirably. The Express was an eight-column folio with the two inside pages "patent matter." David B. Worthington was the editor and proprietor, and under his management the paper was a creditable one. The hard times had its effect on the Express and on August 23, 1894, the size was reduced, being made a seven-column folio.

Mr. Worthington sold the paper in the spring of 1895 to Joseph G. Pierce and George J. Farnsworth, who assumed charge June 6th. The fall of this year was a bad one for the newspaper men of Klamath Falls, and, like the proprietor of the Star, the publishers of the Express experienced financial difficulties. December 16th an assignment was made, precipitated by an attachment of the plant under an action brought in the circuit court by J. W. Hamaker on two promissory notes aggregating $669. On the 19th Evan R. Reames, assignee of the dissolvent partnership of Farnsworth & Pierce, took charge of the paper and issued a few numbers. On January 6, 1896, the financial tangle having been straightened, we find that Mr. Pierce became editor and proprietor. He subsequently conducted the paper for nearly seven years. Under his management the journal advocated free silver principles and was the organ of the fusion forces of Klamath county.

October 27, 1902, the paper was purchased by Roy Hamaker, who presided over its destinies about a year and a half. Under his management the paper took very little part in politics and was independent. J. Scott Taylor, the present owner, purchased the plant and business in May, 1904, the first number under his control being issued on the 19th. Mr. Taylor made many improvements in the Express, among other things making it an all home print paper. It is strongly Democratic and is conducted on up-to-date principles.

Early in February, 1896, D. C. Boyd leased a part of the Star plant which a short time before had been purchased by the Express, and launched a new paper, the Independent, a seven-column folio, at Klamath Falls. Not filling the "long felt want," after a life of only a few months, it suspended, and the Republican, launched immediately after the suspension of the Independent, was more successful in filling the want.

The Klamath Republican, established April 23, 1896, has had many changes in ownership during its life of less than ten years. As its name suggests it is a Republican paper and has been throughout all its many changes in editors and proprietors. The Republican was established by W. E. Bowdoin, who had formerly been the publisher of the Star, and was a seven-column folio. One year after founding the paper Mr. Bowdoin took as a partner Milan A. Loosley, and in July, 1898, Mr. Loosley became sole publisher. June 1, 1889, Mr. Loosley sold the Republican and for a short time it was published by the Republican Publishing Company, Charles J. Roberts, manager. September 21, 1899, W. Huse & Son, formerly of Ponca, Nebraska, purchased the business. Additions to the plant and improvements in the paper were made during the ownership of Huse & Son.

Wesley O. Smith the present owner, purchased the Republican April 30, 1903. The paper was made all home print early in 1905, to accom-moderate the increasing demands of its patrons, and it is one of the "live" papers of Southern Oregon.

On January 1, 1904, was born the Klamath High School News, a publication devoted to the interests of education, a four-column folio, quarterly publication. It was organized and is still published by the students of the Klamath County High School, the only publication of its kind in interior Oregon. From the start the paper met with success, and on November 1, 1904, it became a monthly publication. It is printed in the office of the Klamath Republican. Following was the staff at the date of founding: John G. Swan, editor-in-chief; John Yaden, assistant editor; Agnes Stevenson, exchange editor; Bertha Hammond, society editor; Harry Benson, business manager; Will W. Baldwin, assistant business manager.

The staff at present is: Professor John G. Swan, editor-in-chief; Agnes Stevenson, assistant editor; Alexander Martin, local editor; Georgia B. White, society editor; Maud E. Nail, exchange editor; Will W. Baldwin, business manager; Austin White, assistant business manager.

REMINISCENT.

INDIAN WARS OF 1854-56.

February 23, 1881, C. W. Denton published the following concerning the stirring times of that epoch in the history of Oregon:

"It was during the occupancy by Major Halter, of Fort Dalles, that the first Indian war broke out, some of the incidents of which I will relate. Soon after the great treaty made by General Palmer at The Dalles in October, 1854, hostilities commenced. The general had with him as interpreters Messrs. McDuffe, John Through, Alex. McKee and C. W. Denton, the writer. This treaty included all the important tribes of Indians in the northwest. The greater portion of these Indians became dissatisfied with the terms of the treaty, or, perhaps, never were satisfied with the stipulations. At any rate they soon ignored its provisions.

"Your correspondent thus accounts for the action of the Indians: The Hudson's Bay Company used to trade and traffic a great deal with them; in fact their trade had grown to such an extent that the company established trading posts at Vancouver, Walla Walla, Boise river, Fort Hall, Colville and Coeur d'Alene. Mr. Thomas McKay, the father of Alexander McKay and others of the younger McKay boys, was the overseer and had charge in building these posts. By treaty stipulations between the United States and Great Britain, these were evacuated, and the 'King George men,' as the Indians termed them, were removed into British Columbia. This, I think, was the principal cause of the Indian outbreak, though, perhaps, other causes of slight importance, such as their right to hunting and fishing grounds, might have played some part in the matter. The dissatisfaction seemed to be general throughout all the Indian tribes of the northwest.

"The first act on the part of the Indians was by the Klickitas who killed two or three miners. Lieutenant Rowland, from Vancouver, was detailed to ascertain, if possible, what was the cause of the outrage and to prevent any further depredations. While in the faithful discharge of his duties the lieutenant was killed by the hostiles at, or near, what is now called the 'blockhouse' in Klickitat county. He had before this sought an interview with the Indians, but to no avail. Quartermaster Forsythe detailed an Indian by the name of Mark and your correspondent to deliver a message to Stock Whitley and his tribe, requesting a 'wa-wa' between the Indians and the government authorities at The Dalles; but the old chief refused such an interview. Immediately after these unsuccessful attempts at reconciliation, Major G. O. Haller proceeded to the scene of action, taking with him about sixty men. He encountered the Indians in large numbers between the Klickitat and the Yakima rivers. Here a terrible battle ensued, his handful of men fighting manfully all day against fifteen or twenty times their number. The soldiers were eventually cut off from water and in a perishing condition they maintained the unequal fight. The command finally extricated themselves with the loss of several killed and fifteen or sixteen badly wounded—among the latter Sergeants Roaper and Laweety and Private Murray. Some few of the wounded afterward died. Captain John Darragh did gallant service. He had charge of the pack train and managed to bring supplies to the camp of the besieged. This was one of the most skillfully conducted engagements of the war, though unsuccessful. A scout by the name of Douglass was detailed to bring in the crippled and wounded, and he so adroitly managed it as not to lose a man. Instead of following the trail direct to The Dalles, Douglass made the nearest point on the Columbia river, which he did by traveling an old road near what is now called Goldendale, and from thence to the river at or near where Columbus now stands, from which point he came to the city. He made this tedious and perilous trip in about two days, landing the crippled and wounded at The Dalles, where they received proper care. Had the hostiles attacked this place then, they could have taken and destroyed it, as there were not here a half dozen able-bodied men. The slaughter would have been terrible, as, besides the wounded men there were several helpless women and children."

An "Old Settler" commenting on this portion of Mr. Denton's article, wrote: "The idea that 'a half dozen able-bodied men' were all the town could afford is absurd. The town was full of refugees from the country, and while there were some who predicted our capture, and even went so far as to see the Indians coming several times, nothing happened here to warrant such fears."

"Major Haller with his remaining command fought his way to The Dalles, losing, however, several of his men, among whom was James B. Moholland, a promising young man, who was one of the bravest and most faithful I ever knew. About this time Colonel James K. Kelly, since United States senator from this state, was doing desperate fighting with his command of Oregon volunteers in the vicinity of Walla Walla. In several engagements he fought against great odds, and, on one occasion the volunteers were outnumbered by the Indians thirty to one. The fighting was done in rifle pits and lasted seven days and nights. It is acknowledged by all to have been the hardest Indian fight on the Pacific coast and to this day is called the 'Seven Days' Fight' among the volunteers, several of whom, officers and privates, are still living among us, honored and respected for their bravery on this occasion.

"While this fighting was in progress at Walla Walla, Colonel Wright, of the regular army, was en route to reinforce Colonel Kelly with his volunteers, and being delayed at The Dalles in making ready for the trip, an Indian outbreak took place at the Cascade Falls, the news of which had not been received, however, until he and his command had started and were camped on Five Mile creek. A messenger (the writer of these reminiscences) was sent to apprise Colonel Wright of this state of affairs. He immediately returned to The Dalles and every preparation was made for the relief of the settlers at that place. The colonel and his command, together with a number of volunteers, proceeded down the river the next day, taking with them two steamers, the "Mary" and "Wasco," and a large flat boat, the latter loaded with artillery and cavalry horses. On the trip the machinery of the "Mary" became disabled, in consequence of which the whole convoy was compelled to stop all night at Wind Mountain. The Cascades was reached early the next morning. Orders had previously been given by Colonel Wright not to fire a musket until a landing was made, for fear of causing a general stampede among the cavalry horses, and the old flat-boat being a very frail craft. While nearing the shore the Indians opened fire, wounding one cavalry horse in the hip. While landing and climbing up the bank, one regular soldier was killed. He was a young man from Baltimore, Maryland. A general fight now ensued, and in a short time fighting was going on along the river at different points for a distance of five miles. During the battle Phil Sheridan and his soldiers could be seen at Bradford's Island, on the Oregon side. He rendered great assistance by cooperating with Colonel Wright's forces.

"Your readers can easily conceive from these short reminiscences, which I draw entirely from my memory, of the events, the obstacles and difficulties our pioneers encountered in first making their homes in Eastern Oregon and Eastern Washington. This vast region, extending from the boundary of Southern California, Nevada and Utah, and thence northward to the Missouri river and its tributaries, seems to have been the desired hunting grounds of all the Indian tribes west of the Rocky mountains. Indeed they had roamed undisturbed wherever their wild and semi-savage fancy led them. When immigration extended westward and this once uninhabited region became sparsely settled by the whites, it seemed to mar the quiet disposition of the Indians. Civilization was not congenial to their savage natures. Sickness and disease came among them from the whites, and this, also, seemed to increase their hatred of the conquering race. The several treaties made between the United States and the different Indian tribes, which on the part of the government had not been kept in good faith, had the effect to cause the Indians to look with distrust upon the white man, and to lose confidence in the government. This has been a source of great annoyance to the early settlers of our western territory and thousands of our citizens have been sacrificed to appease the wrath of the savages."

HOW EXPLORER CLARK SPELLED HIS NAME.

Many histories, reminiscences, and historical sketches, including a "Journal" purporting to have been published by Captain Meriwether Lewis, spell the name of Captain William Clark, companion of Lewis, "Clarke," with the final "e." There is no authority for this. The copyplate of his signature is spelled "Clark." But the following letter from Hon. Walter B. Douglas, Judge of the Circuit Court, Eighth Judicial Circuit of Missouri, received by the publishers of this volume February 20, 1905, removes all doubt concerning the correct orthography:

"Dear sirs—Your letter to the secretary of state was sent to me by him; he thinking that by reason of my being president of the Missouri Historical Society, I might be able to give an authoritative answer to your question.

"The Historical Society has a collection of letters of Governor Clark's, and I have seen many other of his writings. In every instance he spells the name 'Clark.' as all of the members of his family did and still do. He wrote the name something like this (here is given a spelling with a slight flourish on the end), I have not made the flourish at the end quite like he generally did. Sometimes it looked not at all like an 'e'—sometimes very much like one, but at all times it was only a flourish. The usage of spelling the name 'Clarke' in the public prints came, I think, from Gass's book. That book, as you know, was the first published account of the exploration. Gass was an unlettered sergeant, whose notes were written out by a Virginia country schoolmaster in what is now West Virginia. Gass, no doubt, had letters or papers signed by Clark, and the schoolmaster took the flourish for an 'e.' The Historical Society has commissions given to military officers of the state by Clark when governor. These are all printed 'William Clark, Governor of Missouri Territory.'

"George Rogers Clark, the governor's brother wrote his name with a like flourish, yet it was never mistaken for an 'e,' and his name is always printed 'Clark.' I may add one other bit of evidence. A monument to Governor Clark, erected by his descendants, over his grave, was unveiled here (St. Louis), last fall. Upon that his name is, also, spelled Clark. These various instances ought to settle the question.

"Yours truly,
"WALTER B. DOUGLAS."

A REMINISCENCE OF THE INDIAN WAR.

O. P. Cresap served as a guide to General Howard during the Bannock and Piute war of 1878, and in that capacity witnessed much of the campaign. His account of the adventures in which he participated during this war is interesting and is as follows:

Tom Meyers and I left Elk creek on the morning of July 2, 1878, bound for Canyon City. We had no particular object in view except to visit the city and did not know there was an Indian war in progress. We arrived at the old Dribblesby ranch, now known as the Smith ranch, about noon, intending to stop there for dinner. I went up and knocked at the door but could get no answer, so went back of the house to see where the family had gone. But I could find no one and going into the house discovered that things were undisturbed. I concluded that the occupants were away on the hills. We fed our horses and secured a cold lunch for ourselves, and rode on. At the next ranch I found no one at home; likewise at the next. Then I became suspicious and the more so because I saw a man scouting near us. So I made bold to inquire of him the reason for this condition of affairs and learned for the first time that the Bannocks and Piutes were on the war-path and that he was one of General Howard's scouts. As he was going to Canyon City we rode along with him and learned more of the trouble. He said that Howard was south of Canyon City in pursuit of the Indians, who were crossing the range and headed toward Long creek.

At Canyon City there was a material stir in the air and all was excitement. Most of the men were under arms and a portion of the women and children had been removed to the mining tunnels west of the town. A shipment of one hundred stands of arms together with ammunition had just been received from The Dalles in response to an appeal from the citizens, who found themselves short of weapons, and every able-bodied man and boy in the town was well equipped and ready to give an account of himself, should the redskins appear. As soon as I learned enough of the particulars to convince me that the people at Elk creek were in danger I made preparations for an immediate return. Before midnight I was well on my way accompanied by Tom and two others who joined us. That was one of the darkest nights I have ever seen and we had to walk our horses so soon as we reached the foothills. We reached Elk creek, or Susanville, about nine o'clock the next morning and in a short time the six or seven families there, the Blake, Bison, Mael and other families, had packed what few necessities were required for the trip and with the exception of John Blake, the merchant who offered to stay and keep watch until we could return, the party headed southward.

After we were well on our way, John Austin and I left the company with the intention of reconnoitering and if possible discover the exact whereabouts of the redskins, who were thought to be over toward Fox valley. We took a north-eastward course. We saw no signs of Indians that day and camped that night on Long creek, about eight miles above the town of that name.

The next morning we descended the creek, soon reaching the open country. We passed Thomas Keeney's place but looked in vain for the next ranch house. I knew about where the house was situated and could not account for my failure to see it now. As we came a little nearer we noticed that the chickens were out of their yard and huddled together in the branches of a tree. By this time we were close to where the house had stood and looking again very closely, we easily solved the mystery of its non-appearance, for there lay a pile of ruins still warm. Although we were aware that the Indians were probably not a great many miles away, we did not believe they were very close to us and rather ascribed the fire to accidental causes than to the redskins. The ruins of the next ranch house were smouldering when we reached it and then it dawned upon us that we were probably close to the trail of the redskins. From that on we proceeded with great caution. The next house was burning and afar off we could see the flames leaping skyward and the smoke curling up in great clouds. Here we saw our first Indian, a scout, but evidently he thought we were advance scouts of the army for he quickly rode out of sight. Little did we think we were so close upon the Indians' heels, but in a few minutes we came in sight of a party of Indians which had passed through Long creek the day previously and was now headed toward the middle fork of the John Day.

The inhabitants of this town and settlers living near by had constructed a log fort and stockade here and in it were gathered the population of the town and those who had come in from surrounding ranches. When the Indians reached this place they attempted to send a small force into the fort on the pretext of being friendly Indians. Wisely and fortunately for those in the fort the warriors were refused admission. Further parley followed, the Indians endeavoring to effect an entrance through some ruse and each time meeting with a repulse. Finally, seeing that the whites could not be deceived and that the fort was too strong to be attacked successfully, the war party passed by within two hundred yards of the fort without offering in any way to molest property. Had the redskins succeeded in gaining an entrance to the fort a massacre of the whites would probably have followed.

Of the Indians there were likely between six and seven hundred, mostly Bannocks and Piutes. The old men, women and children formed the van, the fighting men the rear. With the Indians were some two or three hundred head of horses, which were herded and driven by those unable to fight. The wickiups, personal property and plunder were packed on poles which were dragged by the horses. This advance did most of the plundering and pillaging.

Here at Long creek we met Colonel Bernard, who was the real fighter of the army. He asked me where I had come from and what I had seen of the Indians and I told him all I knew. I told him of conditions at Susanville and he very kindly placed a small detachment of troops at our disposal to guard property at Elk creek. Austin accompanied the soldiers back. With the army were about thirty scouts, recruited mostly from Arizona, and in command of Rube Robbins. While these scouts were well acquainted with Idaho and that portion of Oregon lying near the southern boundary, they were unfamiliar with this region and Colonel Bernard was looking for a man who could pilot them northward through the mountains. He proposed that I go with them and I accepted his offer to act as guide, though no actual enlistment was required of me.

General Howard's plan was to make no attempt to drive the Indians, but rather to follow them closely and keep them headed northward if possible, planning to surround and capture them on the Columbia river. He was afraid that if the Indians were pushed too hard they might make a dash across the Columbia before he could place troops and boats there in sufficient numbers to check them while he cut off their retreat. During the whole time the Indians were marching northward troops had been gathering along the Columbia river, but their movements were very slow. Up to this time but one battle had been fought in this region, the battle of Silver Creek, in which the Indians held their own and might be said to have been victorious. As to General Howard's ability as an Indian fighter, opinions differ, but that he was sincere in his belief that it would be disastrous policy to push the Indians too hard, there is no doubt in my mind. The Indians did not go very far out of their way to commit depredations, but confined themselves strictly to their line of march, evidently wishing to delay hostilities until they were reinforced by their hoped for Umatilla allies.

Thus the army moved slowly, going from Long creek north across the middle fork of the John Day, thence to the north fork and down on Camas prairie toward Pendleton. Our route was marked on every hand by evidences of destruction and carnage. Sometimes we found ranch buildings razed to the ground by fire; again simply ransacked, furniture destroyed, clothes, carpets, etc., stolen, windows broken and goods scattered about. Occasionally we found a white man murdered by the savages. At all the ranches the stock had been driven away and killed, and one had only to notice the dead horses and cattle along the road to know that the Indians had passed that way. At one ranch on Birch creek we found a baby carriage drawn out under the arbor leading to the door of the house, and in the carriage was placed a dead colt. At another place, evidently a dairy farm, in Camas prairie, our attention was attracted by a huge pile of butter stacked up near the house. From the appearance of it the little Indians had used it as a toboggan slide. As we approached one place we noticed a huge, white pyramid. At first we could not make out what it was but as we drew nearer we saw that it was composed of dead sheep, several hundred of them. One of the most pitiful and frequent sights was that of a dead lamb tied between two posts so that it could not move and under its body the ashes of a small fire showing that it had been burned to death. Around these dead lambs were always small moccasin tracks, indicating that this was the work of the children.

Our scouts had frequent skirmishes with the Indians but none of enough consequence to be worth relating. The scouts always moved in front and were followed by the cavalry, the infantry, pack train and artillery bringing up the rear. Next in command after General Howard were Colonel Forsythe and Brevet Colonel Bernard. When we reached the headwaters of the north fork there were two courses for the Indians to leave the country, by Butter Creek or by the Grande Ronde river. By a little maneuvering we turned them from the Grand Ronde and they started down Butter Creek. Here we fought a battle.

A succession of low hills slopes away westward, forming an ideal place for the Indians to make a stand and they did make a stand. When we came up, the hillside was fairly alive with Indians and they commenced heavy firing in our direction. The scouts fell back, the cavalry was ordered to the front and formed into two lines and the men were then ordered to dismount. Then the gatling gun, the only one with the army, was brought up and in less time than it takes to tell it, was dashing out in front of the army on its way up the first hill. The redskins were on the second hill, while between the two there was a small elevation within two hundred yards of the Indians. Slowly the horses mounted the first hill, reached the summit, and then to the astonishment of all, kept on its way to the smaller elevation. The Indians could not understand such apparently foolhardy actions and they stood thunder struck, not even offering to fire. Had they not been overcome by the audacity of the act our men would have certainly met death. As the lead horses reached the summit of the elevation they whirled around; the carriage was unumbered and in an instant a perfect storm of bullets was carrying death and destruction to the ranks of the dusky warriors. The redskins scrambled from their hiding places and rushed pell mell over the summit of the highest hill and into the timber. Our troops came to support the gun, but were not needed. The officers did not allow the soldiers to take full advantage of this victory and the result was that the Indians were pursued only a short distance. George Smith, a soldier was killed in action and several were wounded, though none mortally. After the battle scores of dead horses covered the ground telling plainly of the deadly work of the bullets. This fight took place between the 10th and 15th of July. The casualties among the Indians must have been great, though I never learned just how great. I had followed the gatling gun up the hill and so saw the whole fight very plainly.

The defeated braves, closely pursued by the army, pushed northward and, as is well known, were defeated in battle by Miles near Pendleton. With the death of their chief and leader, Egan, the Indians lost courage and executing a flank movement, commenced to retreat southward. We followed and came up with them a few days later on Lake creek, which empties into the North Fork. Here the Indians made another and final stand and had they possessed the courage which accompanies success they might have made us pay more dearly for victory.

This time they chose for their battle ground a high table rock covering several acres and with nearly perpendicular sides. From its top they bade defiance to the cavalry and scouts, who were under Colonel Forsythe. The trail over this high plateau led through a small gap which could be easily defended against hundreds by a handful of brave men. The scouts, led by Rube Robbins, were ambushed while attempting to gain the summit of this rock through the gap and as a result suffered the loss of one man killed and several wounded, among the latter being Robbins himself. Kennedy, the man who was killed, was wounded in the arm and bled to death. I found him on the field and after giving him a drink of water from my canteen, went for the surgeon and informed him of Kennedy's condition. Then I went to look after another wounded man named Campbell. When the surgeon found Kennedy he was dead.

The cavalry were drawn up in line for a charge when Colonel Bernard came up to me and asked if I knew of any way to dislodge the redskins without great loss of life. I pointed to a high steep hill to the west, which overlooked the table rock, and told him that if he could gain its summit it would be an easy matter to take the Indians in the rear. The troopers having ascended the hill in safety soon dislodged the Indians and forced them to retreat.

The last defeat was too much for the Indians and soon after they divided into two bands, one going south by way of the Greenhorn mountains and the other down the Dixie range. The party which returned by way of the Dixie range killed a Frenchman near Robinsonville and Jimmie Varderman on Elk creek. The Indians kept in the mountains as much as possible, however, and destroyed little if any property. The war was now at an end and as I could be of no further service to the army I helped to take Campbell, the wounded man, down Burnt river, after which I returned to my home at Susanville.

FIRST MARRIAGE IN WASCO COUNTY.

In her entertaining and valuable book entitled "Reminiscences of Eastern Oregon," Mrs. Lord says:

This is the first authentic account of a legal marriage in the county which was really then a part of Clackamas. I will give the incidents as given to me by George Snipes. While I have been familiar with the facts and incidents here related, as they occurred, and have related them many times, as being of an interesting character, yet I was not sure enough of details and felt a delicacy about using the story without having it verified. Mr. Snipes says:

"I came across the plains in the year 1853, arriving on Ten Mile creek in September. While camped there I met a man who, in conversation, asked me where I was from. I told him from Iowa. He asked what county. I replied from Jefferson. He then said he wondered if I knew his people; his name was Nathan Olney. I told him I knew them all, but could not remember that I had ever seen him, as he had been away so long.

"While we were hitching up to start, intending to take the road which branched off across the Cascade mountains, I saw a card on the ground and on picking it up found on it the name of Dr. Shaug, or The Dalles. I had known him well in Iowa, as he had been our family physician for years before coming west. I told one of the boys I wished one of them would drive for me that day, as I wanted to go into town and see an old acquaintance. This was on Saturday, and it was the intention that the train should lie by on Fifteen Mile creek over Sunday. Out from The Dalles are Three Mile, Five Mile, Eight Mile, Ten Mile and Fifteen Mile creeks. I intended to make my visit and overtake them there.

"When I found the doctor he was out at the ranch which he had taken up, the place where I now live. After awhile he said that he thought I would better stop in The Dalles. I said I did not see anything there to make me stay for, but he said it was a good country and he could assure me that I would do well. He said if I wanted a farm he could pick out a good place for me. I said that was what I was looking for, but I thought I had better go on, as I came with that intention.

"Well," said the doctor, "I went through when I came and I have come back because I think this is a better place for a man to get ahead than in the Willamette valley."

"I don't think I can stop now," I replied; "the fact is I have got to go on, as I am going to be married when I get there. The old man won't give me my girl, and I will have to steal her; but I am going to steal her so soon as we get through to the valley."

"Is the girl willing for you to steal her?"

"Yes; she says so."

"Well, why not steal her here and stay? I'll get some fellows I know to go with you and I'll furnish the horses. I know where we can get a side saddle for the girl to ride on, and you can steal her now."

"I thought about this for awhile when the doctor said:

"Let's go back to town and talk it over with my wife."

"We did so and Mrs. Shaug was delighted with the plan. I concluded to try it. Then they told me to go into the tent and write a letter telling the girl just what to do, which I did. The doctor got two men, Jim Thompson and Jim Griffin to go with me and furnished cayuses for all three and one with a side saddle for my girl. When we got to Fifteen Mile we found my train camped there, but the Imblers had gone on, and were either going through to Tygh Valley or make a dry camp before reaching there. I told my friends what I was going to do. They did not like to have me leave them but all understood how the affair stood and wished me good luck. We went on until we got up near where the Brookhouse place now is, and found their train had made a dry camp. Griffin and myself waited at a safe distance, while Thompson went up to the camp, having been instructed how to proceed.

"He tied his horse to a wagon having a certain name, or number on it, went to where they were eating supper, asked for Mr. Imbler and told a yarn about expecting to meet a brother with that train. On being asked to eat supper with them he said that he had eaten supper, but would take a cup of coffee just to be sociable. On seeing Miss Imbler go to the wagon he made an excuse to see to his horse and managed to give her the letter. He then returned to the campfire and told so many tales that when he finally took leave old man Imbler had become suspicious. He at once called the men together and told them that the fellow who had taken a cup of coffee with them had acted and talked so suspiciously that he believed a gang was coming to steal their cattle in the night. They were all excited and drove the cattle up and set a guard over them.

"When Miss Imbler received the letter she called her sister to bring a light and they read it together. By the time she was ready to start the cattle had been rounded up in front of the wagon she was in and her two brothers were standing guard directly opposite. There was nothing to do but wait with patience for an opportunity which at last came. While both of the boys were talking with their backs turned toward the wagon she slipped quietly away and walked down the road to where we three men were waiting for her. When she joined us we all quickly mounted our horses and started for The Dalles, where we arrived at half past two o'clock. We rode up to Dr. Shaug's tent and told them everything was all right. The doctor replied:

"I have good news for you; I have a preacher here."

"We had expected to have to go to Portland to be married, but one of the Hineses came up on the boat that evening to meet a brother expected across the plains. The doctor called in several persons and we were married within an hour after arriving."

Here is another case which is, apparently, the first marriage after Wasco county was created. It is taken from a newspaper of recent date:

In the pioneer days of the 50's weddings were of infrequent occurrence. In fact, Wasco county had been established more than two and one-half years before a marriage was solemnized within its borders. Still, men were susceptible to the charms of women, and doubtless others would have fallen victim to cupid's wiles had the fairer sex been more plenty. Nevertheless fair maidens were led to the altar by brave men, and the first marriage in Wasco county of which there is any record, was celebrated October 3, 1856. In a little volume among the county's archives this record is found:

"Territory of Oregon, County of Wasco, ss:

"This is to certify that the undersigned, a justice of the peace, did on the 3d day of October, 1856, join in lawful wedlock William C. McKay and Miss M. Campbell, in the presence of Dr. Atkins, Dr. Bates, R. R. Thompson and many other witnesses. Oh! what a glorious time we had.

"C. W. SHAUG,
"Justice of the Peace."

A GOOD INDIAN.

Somewhere along between 1855 and 1856 a family by the name of Peat took up a place on Three Mile, above the Bettenger place. A bachelor had the place above the Canyon City road. Mr. Peat had to go to the valley on business and left his wife alone except for a small child and a boy who herded their sheep. A young Indian, handsome and saucy, who had been spoiled by associating with the whites, came into town and bought a bottle of whiskey and got just full enough to be a fool. Starting home he remembered that Mrs. Peat was alone, so he thought he would take her home with him. Of course she was nearly frightened to death, but kept her wits about her.

He worked with all his might to put her on his cayuse, but about the time he thought she was safely mounted she would fall off; then he would whip her and force her to climb on again. Then he would attempt to mount the pony, too, and again she would fall off. Next time he would lead the horse a short distance and she would fall off again. The little one would cry, but he would beat and threaten to kill her, but Mrs. Peat persuaded him not to. The boy talked English very well. He had tied the white boy, who finally got the fastenings loose, and slipping away went to Mr. Brownlee's for help. Mrs. Peat's repeated falls were for the purpose of gaining time until some one would come. I don't know that she knew the boy had gotten away.

The Indian was arrested, tried, convicted and hanged for his night's entertainment. He was hanged from the limb of a large pine tree which used to stand near the Fourth street bridge. He hung there all night and the next morning his relatives got permission to cut down and carry away the body. I can remember those squaws with it across the saddle, going up the beach, wailing their death chant, the most weird and ghastly sound one ever heard. The Indians were very sulky for some time.

BUILT AN EIGHTY-TON BOAT.

The following diversion of 1857 is from The Dalles Chronicle, of 1896:

If any one imagines that the days of daring enterprise in the far west began with the advent of the railroad and telegraph, they will be undeceived when they read the following truthful incident of a task performed which seems herculean, and if a similar one were projected today it would be pronounced visionary and impossible of execution.

In 1857 R. R. Thompson and Jonathan Jackson built a saw mill on the present Wiley place on Fifteen Mile, five miles above Dufur. One day, at a time when there was a temporary lull in business, Mr. O. Humison, then residing at The Dalles, appeared at the sawmill with an astounding proposition. It was to build a boat to navigate the upper Columbia and enter the field of commerce as a common carrier. The plan was to build the boat at the sawmill and haul it overland to a point above the Celilo Falls and launch it in the Columbia. The sawmill men were very skeptical regarding the virtue of the plan, as may readily be imagined; but were finally persuaded to enter into the scheme by the very magnetism and confidence of the projector. So they began work on it. The boat was seventy feet in length; eleven and one-half feet beam, and had a carrying capacity of eighty tons.

It was at length finished and the most difficult part of the work was before them; how to get this unwieldy river monster, weighing many tons, to the water. Three days were spent surveying a route for it. It was then decided to gain the ridge between Des Chutes and Fifteen Mile, and follow it down. This leads into a precipitous canyon, and just how that part of the trip was accomplished is, unfortunately, not known at the present day. But the boat was hauled along by eight yoke of oxen, on slides or long sleds, and it took three weeks to haul it to the river, a distance of thirty miles. Talk about Napoleon crossing the Alps! His heaviest artillery was but a toy to this gigantic river craft, two-thirds as large as the "Regulator." The men of '57 on this coast were built of the staunchest kind of stuff, and nothing could daunt or appall them. They didn't think about Prince Albert coats, immaculate shirt fronts, toothpick shoes, but they just set themselves to some task for the development of the country, and they went ahead. If they lacked any refinement of science or mechanics, any labor-saving device, implement, tool or appliance, they simply conjured up a substitute or got along without it.

And they launched their boat. And they christened it the "Mountaineer." With the aid of pike poles and lines from the bank they ascended the river to Wallula and returned, conveying freight and passengers both ways. When the round trip was accomplished, and they counted up the money in the till, it was found that there was enough funds to pay for all the expenses undergone, of building the boat, hauling and launching it and operating it up the river and down again, and a handsome surplus over and above all.

Afterward the proprietors put sails on the boat, and besides being the first boat on the river, it was for many years the fastest, as well. This company was the nucleus of the old Oregon Steam Navigation Company, afterward merged into the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. Before the days of the "Mountaineer" nothing navigated the river except the batteaux of the Hudson's Bay Company and the Indian canoes. The "Mountaineer" opened the way and pioneered the steam navigation on the Upper Columbia.

A massive shaft of California granite in Sunset Cemetery today marks the last earthly resting place of this pioneer of navigation of the Upper Columbia. Chiseled out of this durable stone near its base appears the name, "Humison," and this is the man whose memory the Chronicle, in this humble way, desires to recall. He was a pioneer.

THE CASCADE MASSACRE.

Concerning the following account of this tragedy it should be remembered that the massacre occurred just across the river from the Cascades in what is now the state of Washington, during the Indian war of 1855-6. Although it did not actually take place on Wasco county soil, it was so closely identified with the history of that county that it should be given in this place. The latter portion of the data brings the story into The Dalles and Wasco county. Our first extract is from a letter published in the Portland Oregonian of January 1, 1857, written by L. W. Coe:

The following letter handed us by Putnam F. Bradford, Esq., descriptive of the massacre at the Cascades, on the 26th of March, 1856, now appears for the first time in print, and is probably the only recorded history in detail, written contemporaneously. Mr. Bradford was at the time in Massachusetts, and having large interests and acquaintances at the Cascades, the letter was intended to convey to him thorough information and description:

THE LETTER.

CASCADES, W. T., 6th April, 1856.—My dear Put:—We have had a little "tea party" since you left, and I will try and give you a little description of the same.

On Wednesday, March 26th, about 8:30 o'clock, a. m., after the men had gone to their usual work on the bridges of the new railway, mostly on the bridge near Brush's house, the Yakimas came down on us. There was a line of them from the Mill creek above us to the big point at the head of the falls, firing simultaneously on the men. The first notices were the bullets and the crack of the guns. Of our men, at the first fire one was killed and several wounded. Will give you a list herein after. Our men, on seeing the Indians, all ran for our store through a shower of bullets, except three who started down stream for the middle blockhouse, distant one and one-half miles. Brush and his family also ran into our store, leaving his own house vacant. The Watkins family came to the store, after a Dutch boy, who was lame from a cut in the foot, had been shot in their house. Watkins, Finlay and Bailey were at work on the new warehouse on the island, around which the water was now high enough to run about three feet deep under the bridges.

There was great confusion in the store at first, and Sinclair, of Walla Walla, going to the railroad door to look out, was shot from the bank above the store and instantly killed. Some of us then commenced getting the guns and rifles which were ready loaded, from behind the counter. Fortunately about an hour before there had been left with us for transportation below nine United States government rifles, with cartridge boxes and ammunition. These saved us. As the upper story of the house was abandoned, Smith, the cook, having come below, and as the stairway was outside where we dare not go, the stovepipe was hauled down, the hole enlarged with axes, and a party of men crawled up, and the upper part of the house was soon secured. We were surprised that the Indians had not rushed into the upper story, as there was nothing or nobody to prevent them. Our men soon got some shots at the Indians on the bank above us. I saw Brush shoot an Indian, the first one killed, who was drawing a bead on Mrs. Watkins as she was running from our store. He dropped instant. Alexander and others mounted into the gable under the roof and from there was done most of our firing, it being the best place of observation. In the meantime we were barricading in the store; making portholes and firing when opportunity offered. But the Indians were soon very cautious about exposing themselves. I took charge of the store, Dan Bradford of the second floor, and Alexander of the garret and roof.

The steamer "Mary" was lying in the mouth of Mill creek, and the wind blowing hard down stream. When we saw Indians running toward her and heard the shots, we supposed she would be taken, and as she lay just out of our sight and we saw smoke rising from her, concluded she was burning, but what was our glad surprise after awhile to see her put out and run across the river. I will give an account of the attack on her hereafter.

The Indians now returned in force to us, and we gave every one a shot who showed himself. They were nearly naked, painted red and had guns, bows and arrows. After awhile Finlay came creeping around the lower point of the island toward our house. We shouted to him to lie down behind a rock and he did so. He called that he could not get to the shore, as the bank above was covered with Indians. He saw, while there, Watkins' house burn. The Indians first took out all they wanted—blankets, clothes, guns, etc. By this time the Indians had crossed in canoes to the island, and we saw them coming, as we supposed, after Finlay. We then saw Watkins and Bailey running around—the river side toward the place where Finlay was, and the Indians in full chase after them. As our men came around the point in full view, Bailey was shot through the arm and leg. He continued on, and plunging into the river, swam to the front of our store and came in safely, except for his wounds. He narrowly escaped going over the falls. Finlay, also, swam across and got in unharmed, which was wonderful, as there was a shower of bullets around them.

Watkins next came running around the point and we called to him to lie down behind a rock, but before he could do so he was shot in the wrist, the ball going up the arm and out the elbow. He dropped behind a rock just as the pursuing Indians came following around the point, but we gave them so hot a reception from our house that they backed out and left poor Watkins where he lay. We called to Watkins to lie still and we would get him off; but we were not able to do so until after the arrival from The Dalles of the steamer "Mary" with troops—two days and nights afterward. During this period Watkins fainted several times from weakness and exposure, the weather being very cold, and he was stripped for swimming, down to his underclothes. When he fainted he would roll down the steep bank into the river, and the ice-cold water reviving him, he would crawl back under fire to his retreat behind the rock. Meantime his wife and children were in the store, in full view, and moaning piteously at his terrible situation. He died from exhaustion two days after he was rescued.

The Indians were now pitching into us right smart. They tried to burn us out; threw rocks and fire-brands, hot irons, pitchwood—everything that would burn on to the roof. But you will recollect that for a short distance back the bank inclined toward the house, and we could see and shoot the Indians who appeared there. So they had to throw from such a distance that the largest rocks and bundles of fire did not quite reach us, and what did generally rolled off the roof. Sometimes the roof got on fire and we cut it out, or with cups of brine drawn from pork barrels, put it out, or with long sticks shoved off the balls. The kitchen roof troubled us the most. How they did pepper us with rocks; some of the big ones would shake the house all over. There were now forty men, women and children in the house—four women and eighteen men who could fight, and eighteen wounded men and children. The steamer "Wasco" was on the Oregon side of the river. We saw her steam up and leave for The Dalles. Shortly after the steamer "Mary" left. She had to take Atwell's fence rails for wood.

So passed the day, during which the Indians had burned Iman's two houses, your sawmill and houses, and the lumber yard at the mouth of Mill creek. At daylight they set fire to your new warehouse on the island, making it as light as day around us. I suppose that they reserved this building for the night that we might not get Watkins off. They did not attack us at night, but the second morning commenced as lively as ever. We had no water, but did have about two dozen bottles of ale and a few bottles of whiskey. These gave out during the day. That night a Spokane Indian, who was traveling with Sinclair, and was in the store with us, volunteered to get a pail of water from the river. I consented and he stripped himself naked, jumped out and down the bank, and was back in no time.

By this time we looked for the steamer from The Dalles, and were greatly disappointed at her non-arrival. We weathered it out during the day, every man keeping his post; never relaxing in vigilance. Every moving object, shadow or suspicious bush on the hill received a shot. The Indians must have thought the house a bombshell. To our ceaseless vigilance I ascribe our safety. Night came again; saw Sheppard's house burn; Brush's house, near by, was also fired, and kept us in light until about 4 o'clock a. m., when, darkness returning, I sent the Spokane Indian for water from the river, and he filled two barrels. He went to and fro like lightning. We, also, slipped poor James Sinclair's body down the slide outside, as the corpse was quite offensive.

The two steamers now having exceeded the length of time we gave them in which to return from The Dalles, we made up our minds for a long siege and until relief came from below. We could not account for it, but supposed the Ninth Regiment had left The Dalles for Walla Walla, and proceeded too far to return. Morning dawned—the third morning—and, lo, the "Mary" and "Wasco," blue with soldiers, and towing a flat boat with dragoon horses, hove in sight. Such a haloo as we gave! As the steamers landed the Indians fired twenty or thirty shots into them, but we could not ascertain with any effect. The soldiers as they got ashore could not be restrained, and plunged into the woods in every direction, while the howitzers sent grape after the now retreating redskins. The soldiers were soon at our store and we, I think I may say, experienced quite a feeling of relief on opening our doors.

During this time we had not heard from below. A company of dragoons, under Colonel Steptoe, went on down; Dan with them. The block house at the Middle Cascades still held out. Allen's house was burned and every other one below. George W. Johnson's, S. M. Hamilton's, F. A. Chenowith's; the wharf-boat at Lower Cascades—all went up. Next in order comes the attack on the "Mary." She lay in Mill creek—no fires—and wind hard ashore. Jim Thompson, John Woodard and Jim Hermans were just going up to the boat from our store and nearly reached her as they were fired upon. Hermans asked if they had any guns. No. He went up to Iman's house, the rest staying to get the steamer out. Captain Dan Baughman and Thompson were ashore on the upper side of the creek, hauling on lines, when the fire became so hot that they ran for the woods past Iman's house. The fireman, James Lindsey, was shot through the shoulder. The engineer, Buskminster, shot an Indian on the gang plank with his revolver, and little Johnny Chance, Watkins' stepson, climbing up on the hurricane deck, with an old dragoon pistol, killed his Indian. Johnny was shot through the leg in doing so. Dick Turpin—half crazy, probably—taking the only gun on the steamboat, jumped into a flat boat lying alongside, then jumped overboard and was drowned. Fires were soon under the boiler and steam was raising. About this time Jesse Kempton—shot while driving an ox team from the sawmill—got on board—also a half-breed named "Bourbon," who was shot in the body. After sufficient steam to move was raised, Hardin Chenowith ran into the pilot house, and, lying on the floor, turned the wheel as he was directed from the lower deck. It is almost needless to say that the pilot house was a target for the Indians. After the steamer was backed out and fairly turned around, he did toot that whistle at them good. Toot! toot! toot! It was music in our ears. The steamer picked up Hermans on the bank above. Iman's family, Sheppard and Vanderpool all got across the river in skiffs, and boarding the "Mary" went to The Dalles.

Colonel George Wright and the Ninth Regiment, Second Dragoons, and Third Artillery, had started for Walla Walla and were out five miles, camped. They received news of the attack at 11 o'clock p. m., and by daylight were back at The Dalles. Starting down they only reached Wind Mountain that night, as the "Mary's" boilers were in bad order because of a new fireman the day before. George Johnson was about to get a boat's crew of Indians, when "Indian Jack" came running to him saying the Yakimas had attacked the blockhouse. He did not believe it, although he heard the cannon. He went up to the Indian village on the sand bar to get his crew; saw some of the Cascade Indians who said they thought the Yakimas had come, and George, now hearing the muskets, ran for home. E. W. Baughman was with him. Bill Murphy had left the blockhouse early for the Indian camp, and had nearly returned before he saw the Indians or was shot at. He returned, two others with him, and ran for George Johnson's about thirty Indians in chase. After reaching Johnson's Murphy continued on and gave Hamilton and all below warning, and the families embarked in small boats for Vancouver. The men would have barricaded in the wharf boat but for the want of ammunition. There was considerable government freight in this wharf boat. They staid about this craft and schooner nearly all day, and until the Indians commenced firing upon them from the zinc house on the bank. They then shoved out. Tommy Price was shot through the leg in getting the boats into the stream. Floating down they met the steamer "Belle" with Sheridan and forty men, sent up on report of an express carried down by Indian Simpson in the morning. George and those with him went on board the steamer and volunteered to serve under Sheridan. The steamer returned and the Indians pitched into Sheridan; fought him all day and drove him with forty men and ten volunteers to below Hamilton's, notwithstanding he had a small cannon; one soldier was killed.

The steamer "Belle" returned next day (third of the attack) and brought ammunition for the blockhouse. Your partner, Bishop, who was in Portland, came up on her. Steamer "Fashion", with volunteers from Portland came at the same time. The volunteers remained at the lower Cascades; Sheridan took his command, and with a batteaux loaded with ammunition crossed to Bradford's island on the Oregon side, where they found most of the Cascade Indians, they having been advised by George Johnson to go there for the first day of the attack. They were crossing and recrossing all the time and Sheridan made them prisoners. He pressed a boat's crew and as they towed up to the head of the island and above, saw great numbers of Indians on the Washington Territory side and opposite them. Sheridan expected them to cross and fight him, and between them and the friendly Indians in his charge, he thought he had his hands full. Just then Sheridan discovered Steptoe and his dragoons, infantry and volunteers, coming down from the "Mary" surprising completely the Indians, who were cooking beef and watching Sheridan across the river. But on sound of the bugle the Indians fled like deer to the woods with the loss of only one killed—"old Joanam." But for the bugle they ought to have captured fifty.

So ended the battle. The Ninth Regiment are building a blockhouse on the hill above us; also at George Johnson's, and will hereafter keep a strong force here. Lieutenant Bissell and twelve men who were stationed at the upper Cascades, were ordered away, and left for The Dalles two days before the attack was made upon us. The Indians Sheridan took on the island were closely guarded. Old Chenoweth (chief) was brought up before Colonel Wright, tried and sentenced to be hanged. The Cascade Indians, being under treaty, were adjudged guilty of treason in fighting. Chenoweth died game; he was hanged on the upper side of Mill creek. I acted as interpreter. He offered ten horses, two squaws and a little something to every "tyee" for his life; said he was afraid of his grave in the ground, and begged to be put in an Indian dead house. He gave a terrific war-whoop while the rope was being put around his neck. I thought he expected the Indians to come and rescue him. The rope did not work well, and while hanging he muttered, "Wake nike quash copa memaloosa!" He was then shot. I was glad to see the old devil killed, being satisfied that he was at the bottom of all the trouble. But I cannot detail at too great length.

The next day Tecomcoc and "Captain Joe," were hanged. "Captain Joe" said that all the Cascade Indians were in the fight. The next day Tsy, Sim Sasselas and "Four-fingered Johnny" were hanged. The next day Chenoweth Jim, Tunwalth and Old Skein suffered the same fate, and Kenewake sentenced to death, but reprieved on the scaffold. In all nine were executed. Banaha is a prisoner at Vancouver, and decorated with ball and chain. The rest of the Cascade Indians are on your island and will be shot if they get off from it. Such are Colonel Wright's orders. Dow, Watiquin, Peter, Makooka John and Kotzue, and perhaps more, have gone with the Yakimas.

I forgot to mention that your house at the lower Cascades, also Bishop's, were burned; also to account for Captain Dan Baughman and Jim Thompson. They put back into the mountains, and at night came down to the river at Vanderpool's place, fished up an old boat and crossed to the Oregon side. They concealed themselves in the rocks on the river bank opposite, where they could watch us, and at night went back into the mountains to sleep. They came in safely after the troops arrived. We do not know how many Indians there were. They attacked the blockhouse, our place, and drove Sheridan all at the same time. We think there were no less than two or three hundred. When the attack was made upon us three of our carpenters made for the middle blockhouse, overtook the cars at the salmon house, cut the mules loose and with the car-drivers all kept on. They were not fired upon until they got to the spring on the railroad, but from there they ran the gauntlet of the bullets and arrows to the fort. Little Jake was killed in the run, and several were wounded. I append a list of the killed and wounded, but this is a long letter; knowing you would be anxious to have all the particulars I have endeavored to give you a true description. Dan is writing to others at home, and he has read this letter. We have got to work again building and transporting; are going to build a sawmill as soon as we can. We had but few specimens of poor men here during the fight—generally all behaving well. There was, however, one notable exception, a person who arrived at the store a few minutes before the fight commenced and whose name I will give you in person.

March 30, 1881, The Dalles Times published another reminiscence relating to the same melancholy tragedy. The Times said:

The following letter from Colorado Springs to a lady in this city from an old resident of White Salmon, Washington Territory, and who fled from there on the "Mary" as described, at the time of the terrible massacre at the Cascades in 1856, has been handed to us for publication:

I am very grateful to you for awakening so many reminiscences by your recent postal. I have never saved by writing or picture any one of these early experiences; but they come back to me vividly—freshly as I ponder them o'er, filling my otherwise lonely hours with brighter pictures than I find in books, so that I am only afraid of being too lengthy or egotistical.

Yes, I was there that 26th of March, 1856, waiting at Mr. Atwell's, on the opposite side of the Columbia, while my husband returned to The Dalles on business. You may recollect that only three weeks before I had seen our own home consumed by Indian fires and heard their savage yells as the troops attempted to cross the river, but returned to the Oregon side to await further orders. So, as we heard firing on the opposite side of the river, and saw the strange course of the steamer "Mary" as she staggered in the strong current, dropped down, down, turned and trembled, and finally made trifling headway upward, we were perhaps more calm than some when the hurrying neighbors said it was the Indians.—"The woods on the other shore are alive with hostiles; they have killed, will kill everybody; their hideous yells even now come across the water. But see! The "Mary" is nearing our shore. We are safe."

Mothers hurry their crying children on board; fathers carrying wood and rails; (anything to burn, for I think she burned hatchways to get across). We gather a little bedding, a few eatables, but think more of escaping with our lives. At another time we might have said, "what a bare, comfortless boat," but now it was our only hope. Her every plank meant protection; escape. My first greeting from the engineer is, "Can you do anything for the wounded?" And as I looked around I realized how narrow the escape—only six men on board; four of them wounded while getting her off; no officer but the engineer. The men who have families on board help as well as landsmen can. We are barely under way when a small boat hails, and a woman is lifted aboard with a babe scarce twenty-four hours old.

On the bare floor of the little cabin one of the wounded ones is moaning sadly, while his life blood is tickling through his blanket and staining the boards. We ask can we help him; try to find him a pillow; but he seems not to understand our language and turns away, so we seek for the others. Little Johnny Chance is in the cook's bunk, crying piteously. "Where are you hurt, Johnnie?" "Oh, my leg—they will cut off my leg!" And then he cries for his mother. But when we take off his boot and find the bullet in it, having gone clear through the leg, he is less excited, and he seems to believe us when we tell him, "They won't cut off your leg." We meet the third man, Jesse, by the engine, holding his shoulder, and trying to show the raw hands how to help, and to our query, "What can we do for you?" says, "I am pretty bad, but that fellow in Brush's room is worse." So we go on to find Mr. Lindsay, with the cold drops of perspiration on his forehead, and his lips closely pressed from excessive pain. The ball had passed through his lung. Can we staunch the blood? We find in the engineer's satchel some cotton and make lint as we have read, for not one person has had experience. We bathe his hands and face and try to find something to nourish him; succeed in getting a little tea, of which the man in the cabin partakes. The sick woman has a few blankets on the other side of the cabin, and the children are huddled in the corner and the women soothing as best they can, for there is nowhere else to go. As the long hours pass by—the boat runs slowly against the wind and current—the engineer is now at his engine, now at the wheel, untiring, calm, masterful.

Mrs. Atwell; I think it is, finds us something to eat; some flour on board, and soda that she mixes and bakes while doing her part watching the children and sick. She is a brave, true woman, and I feel ashamed when I see her energy and endurance; but I can't stay long from the sufferer in the little room. To die so! Can we prolong his life until help is reached? We have not time to think of the dear old home so recently devastated as we glide slowly past. The night shadows are gathering now, and weariness and well nigh despair come over me as I steal over the guards and curl down at the end of the boat. Rumor says The Dalles was to be attacked at the same moment with the Cascades. It was just as unprepared. So we may be met by hostile foes instead of our friends. If so, what can we do? No friendly port within reach! We drop back to meet the foe almost anywhere on either side. There is no outlet over these impassable mountain ranges. We almost hear savage yells as we round rocky points or steer nearer shore, to avoid the swift current. It is quite dark now. The man in the cabin has ceased to breathe. Lindsey is sinking. We forget self as we try to minister to his needs. We can give the cup of cold water if nothing more.

How welcome the cry, "The Dalles! The Dalles!" The lights are burning as usual. All is well. What a crowd of citizens is on the shore, for word has reached them by the little "Wasco" of our peril and probable escape. How precious is kindness now. How keenly we appreciate the upper room made ready for us by Mrs. Cushing. Lindsey is carried so carefully to a room, and the army surgeon is ready to do all that can be done, and after a long illness he recovers. The engineer has done a brave, grand deed, for which I cannot think he was ever suitably rewarded.

A publication unknown to the writer, several years ago published the following relating to the Cascade massacre and the blockhouse which still stands at the upper Cascades:

"It has been suggested that the old blockhouse at the upper Cascades be sent to the World's Fair as a historical relic of this region, and especially because of the association with the name of Sheridan, who, as is often asserted, was quartered there and had a hard battle with the Indians during the great war of 1855-6. There are two reasons why this blockhouse should not be a memento of either that battle or Sheridan. First, it was not built until after the battle; and second, Sheridan was never quartered in any blockhouse, and did not defend one. There was a blockhouse on the level ground known as the Middle Cascades, now gone completely to ruin, where a battle was fought in February, 1856. But Sheridan was not there. When news of the battle reached Vancouver Sheridan, then a lieutenant, was sent with some troops on a steamer to the scene of trouble, arriving the second day of the fight. He made a landing at the lower Cascades, was driven off by the Indians, and retired to Bradford's island, in the river opposite the blockhouse, where he remained until the troops that had come down from The Dalles, under Colonel Wright and Colonel Steptoe, drove the attacking Indians away. It was after this that the present blockhouse was built, two miles up the stream from the old one, and it has stood all these years without receiving a hostile bullet. Sheridan afterward became a great general, but the spurs he won in this fight were very small ones, not for want of bravery, but because he had not men enough to fight the swarm of Indians opposed to him, and he was compelled to seek refuge from destruction."

JOHN SLIBENDER.

The following is from "Hood River Fifty Years Ago," by H. C. Coe:

Old John Slibender, the subject of this sketch, was the last of the old Indians who were strictly residents of Hood River valley, as he and his ancestors for as far back as his family traditions go, made their home here. Slibender must have been close to his hundredth year, for when I first knew him, nearly fifty years ago, he must have then been between forty and fifty years of age. This would fix his birthday close to the period of the Lewis and Clark expedition. During my early boyhood I used to frequently visit his camp, and being the only white boy in the valley the Indians made a good deal of me and taught me to speak their language, which I could do quite fluently. Many a lovely Sunday have I wandered down to old Slibender's camp and listened to his wonderful legends and traditions. Among many, very many, was the noted one, "Bridge of the Gods," and how his great, great grandfather used to paddle his canoe through this wonderful arch and of his uninterrupted canoe trips to sea and return, and how Mount Hood and Mount Adams grew angry at each other, and after a great deal of preliminary swearing, went to work in good earnest, throwing stones at one another until they finally knocked this mighty bridge down and dammed up the river, overflowing much land and killing many Indians. Of the absolute truth of this tradition I never had any question, and the dates must have been about as he stated.

He claimed that his paternal grandparents were very long-lived, and allowing them seventy years each, it would have placed his great-great-grandfather about two hundred years before his time, about the year 1600, or, perhaps later; certainly not before that. John Slibender was a true friend of the whites. All through the Indian wars of 1856 he was unswervingly our friend, upright, truthful and honest; a man one could trust if his skin was dark. A few years ago he was converted to the Christian religion and became a member of the Indian branch of the Shaker church that is spreading so wonderfully throughout the tribes in eastern Oregon and Washington. He was an earnest and enthusiastic worker in his new found hopes. Vale, good John! And for your sake and mine, may your belief in a happy, never-ending future be fully realized.

FORT BOISE MASSACRE.

To the Dufur Dispatch of April 16, 1897, Hon. D. W. Butler contributed the following:

Probably the hardest horseback ride ever made through a hostile Indian country, and the most remarkable case of endurance on record in the northwest, was the 400-mile ride of Enoch Fruit from Fort Boise to The Dalles, in August, 1854, when, without rest he traveled the distance in four days and nights. Fruit was employed by H. P. Isaacs and Orlando Humason to convey the news of the massacre of twenty-three emigrants at a place some forty miles east of Fort Boise. The horrible story told by the messenger created great excitement at The Dalles; but as an eye witness of the scene of horror a short time after, I can testify that man could not tell of, nor pen describe the sickening sight and do it justice, and to the memory of all those, who with me viewed it, it will always rank in the annals of savagery as the most fiendish ever perpetrated—but of that later.

On receipt of the news we gathered as quickly as possible a force of regulars and volunteers, and started for Boise. Our companions numbered thirty-six regulars under Major Granville O. Haller, and by picking up a few after starting, we had about the same number of volunteers under Captain Nate Olney, with Orlando Neal and I. Stoley, lieutenants. At Grande Ronde Valley we were joined by about twenty Cayuse and Nez Perce Indians as allies; R. R. Thompson as Indian agent, with his two packers, and Ex-Governor Gaines also accompanied us from this point, Governor Gaines being on his way to meet his family who were on their way to Oregon (he met them near the scene of the massacre.)

On leaving Grande Ronde Olney took about 18 men and our Indian allies and made a forced march to the Owyhees where he surprised at early dawn an Indian encampment, killing about ten and taking fifteen prisoners, which he held in the bastions of old Fort Boise until the arrival of Major Haller with the rest of the command.

As soon as Major Haller had made camp a short distance from the fort the prisoners were started from their quarters with the intention of bringing them before him. It happened to be about dinner time, and at the sound of the bugle call our captives took it for granted their death warrant had been signed, so scattered to make a desperate run for liberty. A half-breed Indian addressed them in their own tongue and succeeded in reassuring them and all but one stopped. This unfortunate was brought to a halt by a charge of bird shot fired by one of our tame Indians who bore the very appropriate name of "Cut Mouth John." The shot did no serious injury but the Siwash concluded to make the most of it, so jumped into the air, fell flat, and after a few struggles was, apparently, dead. We gathered around the corpse, but old Cut Mouth John declared him "wake memalose" and deliberately poked the end of his iron ramrod into the victims eye which, though a severe test of death, in this case proved a very effectual one, for the victim jumped to his feet with a howl and went back to his comrades.

We were soon convinced that this band had not been concerned in the massacre, and learned that the tribe that had committed the deed had gone north, so we took a northeasterly course and after a few hard days' ride reached the Payette valley, and the second day found their camp with fires still burning; here it was very evident the band had scattered in all directions to avoid pursuit. The next morning we saw two hostiles and closely pressed they ran into a small creek and hid, but our most careful search could not discover their hiding place, so the whites abandoned the search. Not so with our Indian allies who would not leave the stream until they secured the scalps of the fugitives, and finally their perseverance was rewarded; the fugitives were found in a hole which the water had washed in the bank, and which the sod and vegetation concealed from view of any but these human blood-hounds.

The volunteers also captured an Indian and his family this day and took them along, striking south to the Boise valley; here we found the thigh bone and leg down to the boot of some boy that had been killed. We turned down the river to the scene of the massacre. It is over forty years since I visited that spot, and yet the horror of the sight is often before my eyes. Here were the ghastly and mutilated remains of 23 men, women and children stripped of their clothing and putrifying in the sun. The men and children had been killed, the wagons burned and six women of mature age had been taken a distance of fifty yards, thrown down and ravished. And not even then satisfied to dispatch their victims, these inhuman fiends took the red hot bolts from the burning wagons and thrust them into the bodies of their helpless victims, thus burning them to death. After stripping all their victims naked the fiends had cut open the feather beds and scattered the feathers over the bodies. Mr. Isaacs and others had attempted to hastily bury the decaying bodies, but the Indians had returned and dragged them from the shallow graves and left them to rot, exposed to sun and storm, or be devoured by wild beasts. The unfortunate train consisted of three families named

Ward, Wilson, and the other I have forgotten. Two of the Ward boys, twelve and fourteen years of age, escaped, forded the river and made their way to Fort Boise where they were cared for by Isaacs and Humason, who brought them to The Dalles. I afterward became acquainted with one of the Wards at The Dalles. After burying the bodies we started back to Fort Boise. I have forgotten to mention however that owing to the increase of our force, prisoners, etc., we had been out of provisions two weeks, and had been living on horse flesh; but when we reached the fort we met the government supply train which had been delayed on account of being burdened with an old cannon sent out by Uncle Sam.

The season being so far advanced it was thought best that part of our force return to The Dalles, so Major Haller, ten regulars and about as many volunteers, with our Indians, took the old cannon and started on our return. On the upper Umatilla river we found a large concourse of friendly Indians (estimated from two to three thousand of them) who had prepared a grand reception—killed beef, brought vegetables and made ready to treat us royally, and here we camped, cooked and made merry. After dark commenced the war dances over the scalps we had brought in. They built two rows of fires about 150 yards long, the warriors taking the middle aisle with the squaws on the outside; then with the beating of drums, tom-toms, pounding on boards and sticks, with songs and chants interrupted frequently with the most unearthly yells, and with their war-clubs fringed and painted they beat the scalps from one end of the rows of fires to the other, and all the time keeping up their war dances, the figures made weird and horrible by the firelight, it was such a reception as few have ever had the fortune, or misfortune, to be honored with. The next day for fear of more honors we wended our way toward The Dalles, which we reached in due time and were discharged.

Just forty years after we received our pay for the hardships of this trip at the rate of $17 a month and a land warrant, which we might have had much sooner, but Uncle Sam was so busy providing for the support and education of the fiends who had caused the trouble, together with their offspring, that he had no time to attend to the just claims of those who protected his western empire.

A REAL LIVE PRESIDENT.

The Dalles was visited by President Hayes, Mrs. Hayes, Secretary Ramsey and General W. T. Sherman in October, 1880.

Through the city the news had been pretty freely circulated that the presidential party would arrive on the fourth. Excitement began to boil about ten o'clock, a. m., on that day. A special boat had been chartered; every one was on the qui vive. In honor of the occasion one of the elegant, first-class coaches lately arrived from the east had been handsomely decorated for the occasion. The interior was festooned with evergreens; two American flags ornamented the ends of the coach; the chandeliers were girdled by wreaths of beautiful flowers, contributed by Mrs. J. T. Storrs and Mrs. S. L. Brooks. The whole ornamentation was the work of ladies of the city, principal among whom might be mentioned Mrs. H. H. Sansbury, Mrs. E. R. Noble, Mrs. S. L. Brooks and Miss Ella Moran.

A large number of people thronged the railroad bridge, eager to secure a sight of one "real, live president," of the United States. At 2:30 p. m., a whistle announced his approach. Crowds rushed down to the wharf-boat, and besieged the steamer Hassalo, anxious to obtain a glimpse of the notable party. The coach was taken to the boat landing and the administrative representatives placed on board the cars. President Hayes came out on the platform and addressed a few pleasant remarks to the assembly. He was followed by Secretary Ramsey and General Sherman, and vociferous was the applause from The Dallesites. Mrs. Hayes appeared and in her customary agreeable manner expressed her appreciation of the ovation. Three hearty cheers were given, followed by a general handshaking.

The presidential train was en route for Walla Walla. It stopped in front of the Umatilla House where the same crowd again thronged around the car, and again the president greeted them with a smile and a handshake. Both the Umatilla House and the Cosmopolitan Hotel were decorated with flags. Amid shouts and waving of handkerchiefs the train roared on its way to Celilo. That afternoon was a half holiday; the president had promised to stop for awhile at The Dalles on his way back from Walla Walla. That evening a public meeting was held at the court house, and preparations made for a reception of the party. A number of committees were appointed. The two days following were devoted to preparing Masonic Hall for receiving the honored guests. The streets were crowded. Almost every store was decorated with flags and bunting. Arrangements had been made that when the party arrived at Celilo notice should be given by ringing the bells of the city so that the school children might meet and march to the hall. But it was eight o'clock p. m., before the bells rang out; by that hour every one had congregated at the hall. Therefore it became inconvenient for the children to meet at the school house.

Around the new Masonic hall the streets were densely packed on the arrival of the presidential party. Mr. Hayes appeared leaning on the arm of the mayor, accompanied by Mrs. Hayes, Secretary Ramsey and General Sherman. The president was escorted to a platform and Judge W. Lair Hill, in a few appropriate remarks welcomed the guests of the evening. In response President Hayes expressed astonishment at meeting so large an assembly to greet his party. He said that his visit to Oregon had been a constant succession of surprises, and that he had been most favorably impressed with the Columbia river and the country that he had seen along its banks. He declared that the grandeur of its scenery rivalled that of the St. Lawrence or the Hudson, and far surpassed that of any other river on the American continent. Many of his hearers, he doubted not, had been pioneers in this country, and had wended their difficult way many years ago over mountains and across plains to these far away shores where they had remained patiently waiting for the "good time coming." They had, he said, not much longer to wait, for within a few years at most they would have two lines of railway connecting them with the wealth and population of the Atlantic coast, and then Oregon would become an important and populous state.

At the conclusion of the president's speech Secretary Ramsey and General Sherman were introduced and spoke briefly. Mrs. Hayes was then requested to greet them, with which request she graciously complied, bowed her acknowledgments and was welcomed with enthusiastic cheers. At the close of the speeches over 300 children filed into the hall and were pleasantly greeted by the president and Mrs. Hayes. Tastily dressed and carrying wreaths of flowers the little ones swarmed around the party and shook hands with the distinguished guests. At ten o'clock, p. m., carriages were in waiting, and escorted by The Dalles Fire Department, brass band, etc., the party boarded the boat and went down the river the following day.

A pleasant incident occurred at the close of the general reception. Mr. Ben Robinson came in with a basket of fine Oregon apples, as a present to Mrs. Hayes, by "Master Winfred Robinson." She looked at this fruit in amazement, and thought they must be wax work. She was assured that they were apples grown around the country where General Sherman said he didn't know how men made a living. She was very much pleased with the present and declared she would take them home with her. On entering the carriage she was very careful that she had her basket of fruit with her.

Thus ended an event long to be remembered in the history of The Dalles. The crowd might have filed past the president and his lady with more military precision and thus pleased the taste for discipline which General Sherman's military education had given him; but all attempted to give the president and his party a cordial and hearty welcome, and by so doing to attest their appreciation of his administration and their loyalty to the national government.

THE GREAT OREGON SNOWSTORM OF 1884-5.

December 25, 1884, over one hundred weary passengers on the snowbound Pacific Express ate their Christmas dinner in the snowbanks, near Viento, Wasco county, Oregon, a small station on the main line of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's road, sixty miles east of Portland. There were no turkeys and cranberry sauce; no plum pudding and pumpkin pies; no Christmas tree, holly or mistletoe; no Santa Claus showed up to fill the stockings of the little ones. But there was a superabundance of snow, ice and chilling east wind. The latter swept down the Columbia river gorge in unabated fury. Old time residents of Portland will well remember the period of that historic blockade—twenty-three days when the Pacific Northwest was in the grip of a record breaking storm; a ceaseless fall of snow. All over Western Oregon and Washington Territory, as well as the Inland Empire, the storm raged angrily; traffic was blockaded; many lines of industry were paralyzed.

During this memorable episode the center of interest was the blockaded train in charge of Conductor Edward Lyons. For three weeks the Pacific Express was hemmed in by snow and ice, and all the time big Ed. Lyons busied himself looking after the wants of the passengers and doing everything possible that might contribute to their comfort and safety. Once he risked his life by going alone on foot to Cascade Locks to procure food for the imprisoned passengers.

This ill-fated train left The Dalles on the morning of December 19, 1884. During fifteen days the train was tied up in the snow two miles west of Viento. Following the breaking of that blockade it was held at Cascade Locks for several days, while a thousand workmen cut and picked at a solid bank of snow and ice that obstructed the track between Oneonta and Multnomah Falls. At last the second blockade was broken and Conductor Lyons brought his train through, reaching Portland shortly after midnight of January 7, 1885.

At the time of the Viento blockade the Columbia River line was the only transcontinental railroad leading into Portland. The blockaded train consisted of seven cars, containing 150 passengers, aside from through mail and express from the east. The train left Wallula Junction with passengers from the Northern Pacific and the through Pullman car from St. Paul, as well as a Pullman from the Dayton-Walla Walla branch. At Umatilla Junction passengers from Huntington were picked up, and the train won its way to The Dalles without serious delay. Here two days were passed, and after a conference with H. S. Rowe, the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's superintendent, Conductor Lyons decided to attempt the run to Portland. Another train that had followed from Umatilla was consolidated with the first train, which still remained in charge of Conductor Lyons and Engineer Charles Evans. The train was, also, provided with a "helper" engine.

The night of December 17th snow-plows were sent westward from The Dalles, and when it was reported back that the track was opened to Mosier the Pacific Express pulled out. Without serious delay Hood River was reached; the train proceeded to Viento. Two miles west of this station snowdrifts became impassible; the train was brought to a standstill. Night came on dark and gloomy. Fuel and provisions were running short; steadily the drifting snow grew deeper. The paralyzed train hung close to the massive rocks that almost overhung the Columbia; the chilling winds tossed broken limbs of pine and fir upon the cartops. The sullen river at first ran flush with ice floes; latter on they were frozen into a solid sheet. No news or comfort came with the morning to cheer the imprisoned passengers.

Conductor Lyons was fully alive to the fact that the situation had become alarming. He promptly decided to organize his colony. Accordingly he appointed himself commander-in-chief, and two railroad men from the Northern Pacific line were selected as lieutenants, and placed in charge of the commissary. Supplies of food had been brought from Hood River on sleds; the "lieutenants" purveyed it so judiciously that no one suffered from hunger. Two days dragged away monotonously; on the morning of December 22d all able-bodied men were ordered to "move on." Accordingly some twenty-five men struck out on foot for Cascade Locks, eleven miles distant. Some of these became exhausted and sought refuge at neighboring ranches. But the greater number of them reached the Locks safely. Afterward they came on to Portland—walking until the relief trains met them near Troutdale. Between December 23d and 30th more men abandoned the train and started for the Locks. One hundred passengers, mainly women and children remained, aside from the train crew. Provisions were at a low ebb and there was no coal. The pine limbs that fell upon the cars were cut and burned.

Conductor Lyons started on his memorable journey to Cascade Locks on the morning of December 24th. He proceeded alone floundering through blinding snow, and reaching his destination about dusk. Here he organized a relief party and employed a dozen Columbia river fishermen to assist him in conveying his supplies to the storm-bound train. To each of these men Lyons gave an order for $20 on the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. Christmas morning they left the Locks and toiled through the heavy drifts and blinding snow. With them they carried a substantial, if not a delicately assorted, Christmas dinner. It consisted of bacon, beans, canned fruit, pickles and coffee.

One dreary week of imprisonment passed; then another and still the blockade remained unbroken. Meantime the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company was making most strenuous efforts to reach the train. From Portland were brought all the idle men to dig snow and ice from the tracks between that city and Bonneville. There were more than a thousand shovelers. Every hobo in Portland was provided with a pick and shovel; the prisoners in the city jail were liberated and set to work. From both directions snow-plows were digging steadily in, still it was impossible to get within miles of the train. Between Hood River and The Dalles the engine attached to one of the snow-plows upset, killing Engineer Hudson. It is estimated that the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company expended $5,000 a day to liberate the passengers from the blockade. Officials of the company and laborers endured many hardships, but worked on doggedly; human endurance against the elements. So fast as snow was cleared from one portion of the track it piled up again. Fresh storms swept over the country, but the powerful snow-plows and determined shovelers wrought on grimly.

December 30th, from Wallula, a Northern Pacific snow-plow, larger and heavier than any owned by the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, was sent down to The Dalles. This gigantic machine was in charge of J. M. Buckley, Western superintendent of the Northern Pacific Company. It reached Viento on the 31st. Here the Pacific Express had backed down in order to be sidetracked. Two days later the road was opened as far as Bonneville, into which station the blockaded train followed Superintendent Buckley and the big plow. Upon learning that no supplies were to be had at Bonneville, Conductor Lyons backed his train to Cascade Locks and awaited developments. The storm had nearly exhausted its fury; still there remained an almost solid wall of snow and ice between Oneonta and Multnomah Falls. Eight hundred men were assaulting the frozen mass. On the afternoon of January 7, 1885, the road was cleared; a "chinook" wind sprang up; the storm was over and traffic was resumed.

RELIC OF THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION.

Within a stonethrow of the Pacific ocean, surrounded by a thicket of underbrush, a score or two of smooth stones, almost concealed by a century's growth of dwarf pines and rank grasses, compose a most interesting relic of the Lewis and Clark expedition. In the winter of 1805-6 these smooth stones which still by their arrangement suggest a small oven, were utilized by the explorers for boiling salt from sea water. Recently the Oregon Historical Society has spared no pains to establish the fact that these stones actually composed the famous cairn used by Lewis and Clark, and has protected the precious relic from the attacks of cows and vandals by surrounding it with a high barbed wire fence.

This ancient salt cairn is located on the beach at Seaside, Oregon, half a day's journey from Portland. A visit to it composed one of the many side trips enjoyed by visitors this year to the Lewis and Clark exposition. A short distance from Seaside is the site of old Fort Clatsop where the Lewis and Clark expedition passed the winter of 1805-6. This locality, aside from its natural attractiveness, is one of peculiarly historic interest. The story surrounding this heap of rocks makes an interesting chapter in the entertaining history of the daring explorations of these men. The Lewis and Clark expedition, commemorated this year by the grand exposition at Portland, was notable as being the primal cause of adding to the domain of the United States, by right of exploration, the vast "Oregon country," composed of the states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho, and portions of Montana and Wyoming; a territory of wonderful fertility and vast mineral wealth, covering 307,000 square miles. Incidentally the expedition opened the way to further acquisitions of territory, which included Alaska, Guam, the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands.

December 28th, according to the journals of the explorers, five men were sent, "each with a large kettle," to the seaside "to begin the manufacture of salt." This was the first successful effort made to secure the salt, and the cairn which the exposition visitors went to Seaside to view, was built by the five men who started out so boldly "each with a large kettle." The five men were five days in discovering a suitable place. The cairn erected by them was substantial and suitable for the purpose. It measured 33 feet in circumference, with a long, narrow fireplace to accommodate the five kettles. It was constructed of the smooth, clean stones that abound in the neighborhood, and the stones were cemented together with a native clay found near at hand. The authenticity of this pile of stones which now remains to mark the place has been established by the affidavits of Silas B. Smith, a grandson of old Chief Comowool, and Mrs. Jennie Michel, or Tsin-is-tum, a squaw who recently died at a great age.

January 5th two of the five salt makers returned to Fort Clatsop with a gallon of home made salt, the result of four days' labor. The narrative says of it that it was "white, fine and very good, but not so strong as the rock salt common to the western parts of the United States. It proved conclusively to be a most agreeable addition to our food, and as the salt makers can manufacture three or four quarts a day, we have prospect of a very plentiful supply."

But the prediction of "three or four quarts a day" proved incorrect. It was a rainy winter. Sergeant Gass, whose journal is a valuable source of information, writes under date of April 8, 1806:

"Some of the men are complaining of rheumatic pains which are to be expected from the wet and cold we suffered last winter during which from the fourth of November, 1805, to the 25th of March, 1806, there were not more than 12 days in which it did not rain, and of these but six were clear."

Rain and salt making did not go well together. The task of securing fuel proved difficult; the boiling process was slow and tiresome in the extreme. Practically every one in the party, with the exceptions of Captains Lewis and Clark, was compelled to do his turn at the cairn, and when the party was ready to leave winter quarters and begin the long return journey across the mountains, only twenty gallons of salt evidenced their labors. Of this supply twelve gallons were packed in kegs to be used until the party could reach the Missouri river caches, where the supply could be replenished.

The story of the salt makers, forming as it does a single incident in the romance of Lewis and Clark, has been read with unusual interest by many this year on account of the Lewis and Clark exposition which opened June 1st. The trip to Seaside and the salt cairn is entertaining, and is made at comparatively small cost. On the way to the coast one may stop off a day at Astoria, a delightful old town which owes its name to John Jacob Astor, and which bears the distinction of being the first American settlement on the Pacific coast.

COLONEL GILLIAM.

"No doubt the name of Colonel Gilliam is a household word with many in this county," says the Fossil Journal of February 22, 1889. "If it isn't it ought to be. Aside from the fact that this county is named after him, the late Colonel Gilliam's services in behalf of his fellow men entitle him to an important place in the history of this coast. A few facts regarding his career may be interesting to our readers. He was born while Washington was yet president, in 1798, in the state of North Carolina. His father's family moved westward and settled in Missouri, where during the year 1820, in Ray county, the colonel married Miss Mary Crawford. Ten years later we find him elected sheriff of Clay county. Those days were full of stir and eventful happenings throughout the land. In 1832 the last signer of the Declaration of Independence died. The same year the Indians of the northwest began hostilities. In 1835 trouble began with the Indians in Florida. In 1836 and 1837 were the financial and Texan war for independence. It seems that Mr. Gilliam determined to have a share in some of those things and, when during the early part of Van Buren's administration, it was decided to push the Seminole war to a speedy end, he went from Missouri in 1837 as a captain. He served during the winter of 1837-38 in that vigorous campaign which Zachariah Taylor carried on in the everglades of Florida. During the summer of 1838 Captain Gilliam returned to Missouri, having won honest distinction during this brief but arduous service.

"In the fall of this same year, when it had been decided by the state authorities to remove the Mormons, or rather to expel them from their homes in Jackson county, and the militia had been summoned to the field, Captain Gilliam raised a company and was chosen its captain. He was soon promoted and made colonel on account of meritorious conduct. When the Mormons had been helped to emigrate, and his services were no longer needed, he returned to his family and devoted his energies to helping on their interests. Previous to his going to the Mormon war he had removed to Andrew county,

Missouri, where he lived until his emigration to Oregon. Somewhere about 1840 he was sent to represent his county in the legislature. While attending upon this session of the legislature he seems to have become an ardent admirer of Thomas H. Benton. It is probable that his notion of going to Oregon came from Mr. Benton's well known enthusiasm about the west, and his plan for settling the Oregon boundary seems to have found a responsive chord in Colonel Gilliam's breast, and it was not long until he was one of that company which looked toward those 'continuous woods where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound save its own dashings.'

"The year 1844 saw the difficulties, the trials and finally the successful ending of Colonel Gilliam's journey across the plains. He first settled in Dallas, in Polk county, but soon sold out and moved a little farther south, settling on Pee Dee creek, somewhat north of King's Valley in Benton county. Not many are aware that Mr. Gilliam was a life long member of the Masonic fraternity, but such is the fact. * * * *

"Following the Whitman massacre Colonel Gilliam led a company up the Columbia to The Dalles, and in the spring and summer of 1848 led a vigorous campaign against the hostiles. His death, as related by William A. Jack, an eye witness, occurred at Wells Springs, north of Heppner. His command was marching from Walla Walla to The Dalles. Colonel Gilliam had put his lariat in a wagon driven by a man named Evans. In the evening the colonel asked for the rope, and while pulling it out, Evans in some manner discharged the rifle of a half-breed, which had the ramrod down upon the bullet. The bullet missed the colonel, but the ramrod struck him in the middle of the forehead, killing him instantly.

"Colonel Gilliam was a religious man in the truest sense of the word. In this connection it may be said that soon after his settlement in what is now Polk county, he organized a Free Will Baptist church in what was known as the Gage neighborhood on the North Luckiamute. The church held its meetings in the house of Joseph (?) Gage, and Colonel Gilliam was their preacher. Some of the members of that old organization yet live, though the organization itself has long been a thing of the past. To those who knew him intimately, it is a great pleasure to cherish their knowledge of his quiet, unobtrusive piety. In the words of a writer who has prepared an interesting biography of the late Colonel Gilliam, 'he was indeed, a good man, whose wise and kind words furnished guidance to some who still live to cherish his memory.'"

HANK VAUGHN.

The Dalles Times, January 4, 1882: Mr. J. H. Ward, who was in a livery stable across the street at the time of the occurrence, gave us the following version:

Vaughn and Long had quarreled in the morning over a game of cards. About four o'clock in the afternoon they met in Til Glaze's saloon, and Vaughn, approaching the counter said, "Gentlemen, I wish you to drink with me as a gentleman." At this several walked up to the counter and among the rest Charlie Long. Vaughn went up to Long and said: "Now, Charlie, if I'm right, drink with me like a gentleman, and if I am wrong, commence shooting." At this they grabbed left hands and emptied their revolvers at each other, Long taking the first shot, which was the glancing scalp wound Vaughn received. Both were intoxicated at the time and the ranging of the balls at such quarters would give evidence that they moved around considerably and fired unsteadily. Vaughn fired five shots and hit Long four times. Long shot four times. Both had self-cocking pistols. During the shooting there were only two men in the room besides the combatants—one of them hidden behind a screen, and the other dead drunk and lying on the floor between two barrels.

After the shooting Vaughn came out and told the crowd it was a hard fight, and then walked up to Graham's saloon, said he was a dead man and invited the men to take a drink with him, after which he was taken home in a buggy. Our informant says Long is getting alone nicely, but he thinks he will lose the use of his left arm, as that shoulder is terribly shattered. Dr. Baldwin has called to see Vaughn and after probing for the ball came to the conclusion that it had ranged upward and lodged in the body but not in any vital point. He thinks with care Vaughn may recover.

PEDRO AND WILSON.

In the early days there lived in the Klamath country two Indians, Pedro and Hunter Wilson, who, in their palmy days, according to a story told by Sikes Worden, himself an early day resident, far outstripped all others in the skill of hunting and trapping. Among Indians or hunters they never had any peers in the country and their names are familiar to all the very early settlers. They were widely known as crack shots and as adepts in finding wild game. But with all their skill and daring in bear hunting, their efforts never resulting in failure, they had many hair-lifting experiences with the long-clawed huggers of the forest and many narrow escapes from being devoured.

However their valor never left them when in close quarters with a hungry bear, and when in numerous instances wherein guns could not be used, they whipped out their knives and overpowered the ferocious animals in a hand to hand fight. Wilson was a better marksman than Pedro, while the latter surpassed in the ability of an observer, that is to hunt out and locate retreats of big game. They were not only well known as hunters, but bore high reputations for friendship to the whites, and frequently acted as guides for the latter, and their services were particularly sought often and considered valuable by the soldiers when they were stationed at Fort Klamath. Neither of the two hunters took part in the Modoc War, each refusing to break his friendly ties with the whites. Wilson was a Klamath Indian and lived on Williamson river. Pedro was a survivor of the Molla band and became blended with the Klamaths by marriage as a sequel to periodic visits to that tribe in his youth.

ADVISING THE GOVERNMENT.

During the progress of the Modoc War the authorities at Washington received many suggestions for the conduct of the war. After the Indians had been captured the departments at our national capital were fairly deluged with petitions and advice as to the disposal of the Indians under sentence of death and the rest of the tribe. Most of the petitions were for clemency. To those acquainted with the habits of the savages on what was on their frontier, these petitions were often amusing. Most of the prayers for clemency came from the eastern states and the knowledge of the subjects written about were often limited.

One enthusiast suggested that sulphur smoke be employed to bring the savages out of their "lava holes." Another thought the proper disposition of the captured Modocs would be to distribute them among the farms of Pennsylvania, where they could secure employment. Still another thought they should be taken to a distant island and that he, the writer, should be employed to take care of them. We reproduce two of the letters:

"New Brunswick, April 17, 1873—This morning I wrote to Mr. Creswell suggesting that it might be of much good practice to use any material that would be most likely to drive the Modocs from their fastenings, but as by the morning papers Mr. Creswell is not in Washington, permit me to suggest that gas—smoke from sulphur, as the most sure means of forcing the savages out of their lava holes.

“Yours respectfully,

“A. HAMILTON.

“The Hon. Secretary of the Interior.”

“Concordville, Delaware County, Pennsylvania, Ninth month, 11, 1873, Esteemed President: I am a member of the Society of Friends, for which, however, I do not claim to be a saint, but if rightly knowing my own mind, I have a strong desire for the advancement of truth and practical righteousness.

“I presume thou hast received many letters in relation to the Modocs, and I do not wish to be in any way troublesome, but as I sat in meeting this morning the subject of those prisoners arose before my mind, and it seemed to impress me so forcibly that I believe it to be right to lay the case before thee, hoping that thy judgment in the matter (be it what it may) will be for the very best.

“It appeared to me that the government that had shown so much advancement in Christian charity in the treatment of those lately in rebellion against it should not now be stained with the blood of a few miserable savages; poor, ignorant and deluded, yet withal, men and brothers in the sight of the Infinite Creator of us all. And the proposition came before me which I will state, in a spirit of love, for thy consideration.

“It is that these prisoners be sent to some Island, or place of security for the rest of their lives, with or without some of the rest of their tribe, and some one or more be sent with them to have charge over them; that endeavors be used to enlighten them in better way of life, and awaken in their hearts that sense of truth and right which will lead them into a condemnation of their previous course.

“Now, though I have a good home, and surrounded with a family whom I love, and have no desire for preferment in political affairs, yet should there be no one more suitable, nor willing to undertake the task, my name is at thy command for, as undesirable as is the undertaking, I would much rather do it than to see the Christian name and power of this beloved nation lowered in the sight of God and man.

“Very truly,

“LEWIS PALMER.

INCIDENT OF THE MODOC WAR.

During the Modoc War and the massacre of settlers which accompanied the breaking out of hostilities, some of the incidents are retained in the memory of those who took an active part during this stirring period, but who can tell in detail the tragedies enacted when the hostile Modocs swept down upon their unsuspecting victims? Who can depict the terror which entered the breast of the settler when he heard the savage warwhoop and knew that his life was demanded?

The parties of men who scoured the Tule lake valley after the massacre hunting the bodies of the victims and seeking to rescue possible survivors of the massacre, came in contact with many incidents that did not raise their estimation of the “noble red man.”

One case was that of Adam Schillinglow, a Scotchman who had settled just south of Tule Lake, in close proximity to the stronghold in the lava beds. After the massacre a party of five soldiers from Captain Jackson's command, under the leadership of Ivan Applegate visited the cabin of Mr. Schillinglow. The cabin was devastated and partly burned. A bloody arrow and blood-stains in the cabin told the story of the Modoc's visit. The remains of a man supposed to have been murdered could not be found and the party passed on.

A little later Ivan, accompanied by his brother O. C. Applegate, and a small party of friendly Indians, again visited the Schillinglow's cabin. Now it was daylight and a bloody trail could be traced leading away from the house in a northerly direction. It was evident that the Scotchman had made his escape, though in a badly wounded condition, and the Applegates decided to follow the trail and if he still lived to rescue the man. The trail of blood was visible for some distance and the party spread out to make the search more thorough. The dead body of Mr. Schillinglow was at last found. The searching party came near being cut off and massacred by Indians, but the succeeded in escaping.

The details of the attack on the Scotchman were learned after the war was over and the Modocs were taken into custody. The Indians had stealthily approached the cabin at night and a few made their way to the roof. An opening was made in the roof without awakening the sleeper within. When an opening sufficient for their purpose had been made the Indians began tapping on the roof, which of course aroused the sleeper. He arose, lighted a lamp and, the tapping continuing, looked up to see what caused the noise. Then came an arrow through the hole which struck Mr. Schillinglow in the throat and ranged downward.

The wounded man pulled the arrow from his throat, dashed it upon the ground in front of the cabin and made a dash for his horse, which was in a stone corral back of the cabin. Almost miraculously, it would seem, he succeeded in mounting his horse and making his escape, starting for the settlement in the north. One can only imagine the terrors of that ride. Wounded to death he continued on until from loss of blood, he fell to rise no more.

DAVE HILL, THE KLAMATH SCOUT.

Dave Hill, the well known Klamath chief and scout, the white man's friend and an acknowledged leader of his people in civilization, was about forty-six years old when assassinated near Linkville. The following account of his death was published in the Ashland Tidings in April, 1892, by Mr. O. C. Applegate:

His father, Skidart, was the chief of the old village of Ouxy, on the Klamath marsh, when Fremont reached there on his exploring expedition. Wa-wa-laix, as Dave was known in youth, was a worthy son of superior parents. He acquired great skill in athletic sports, as horsemanship and the chase, and while yet quite young gained credit as a scout and warrior in the days of almost ceaseless conflict among the Indians, prior to the Klamath and Modoc treaty of October 14, 1864.

In 1866 he distinguished himself as a scout in the Snake war in connection with the Oregon volunteers under command of the lamented Lieutenant John F. Small. The Klamath scouts took an active part in an attack on the Snakes at Lake Albert. Dave killed the chief, Chac-chach-chuck, and did more, perhaps, than any other man toward the final discomfiture of his band. Late in the fall of 1867 Hon. J. W. Perit Huntington, superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, undertook with a band of beef cattle and a large wagon train laden with supplies and annuity goods for Klamath agency, to traverse the country from The Dalles to Klamath, along the eastern side of the Cascade chain. This was a hazardous undertaking at that season, as there was a hundred miles of almost unbroken forest to encounter, and deep snows were liable to occur in October and November in the high lands about the source of the Des Chutes.

The Snakes were yet at war, and the contemplated route lay through Chief Paulina's realm. Agent Lindsay Applegate received orders to meet the superintendent and immediately set out to comply, accompanied by an escort of six regulars and the writer's hastily organized company of Klamaths. This was a unique and interesting organization. It was the famous "Axe and Rifle" company which rendered efficient service in guarding the train through the Snake country, but more in opening the way through the black pine forests about the upper Des Chutes, Corral springs and Klamath marsh, during a snowy November when some nights all the animals, including sixty or eighty head of wild steers had to be tied to the pines to prevent their instinctive flight from the regions of snow. Dave Hill, who was, I believe a second lieutenant, Allen David being first, was throughout the campaign tireless in his vigilance and activity, and the success of the expedition was due much to his activity and skill.

In 1869 in company with Superintendent A. B. Meacham and Ivan Applegate, Dave was present at the treaty made with the Piute chiefs, How-lock, E-e-gan and O-che-ho, at Camp Harney, and assisted in establishing O-che-ho's band at Yainax on the Klamath reservation. Later the same autumn he took an active part in the removal of Captain Jack's band of Modocs from Tule lake and in their establishment at Modoc point on Klamath lake. On the breaking out of the Modoc War Dave Hill was the first loyal at the front. On the night preceding the outbreak, with the writer and Charlie Monroe, he lay in wait for Modoc scouts at the lone pine on Lost river; at daylight he was in the Modoc encampment, near the Crawley house on the north side of the river encouraging those sullen people to lay down their arms and consent to go peaceably to Yainax, and when the firing began we had no man more fearless or intrepid on the field that day.

Seeing the Modocs, who considerably outnumbered our force, on the north side of the river, getting their horses and escaping to the hills, the writer and four men, including Dave Hill, started to intercept them, when a wounded sergeant from Captain Jackson's command, which was engaged with Captain Jack on the opposite side of the river, galloped within hearing of us with a request from Jackson to assist in getting his dead and wounded across Lost river. Nearly a third of his command—ten men out of 35—were already either dead or wounded and they were placed on the river bank, under a strong guard, a quarter of a mile above us, awaiting assistance. There were no boats on Jackson's side. We first detailed Dave Hill and Dan Colwell to take a canoe and row up the river, but this proved of no avail on account of a heavy wind. Then Dave sprang onto the horse behind the writer, with his Winchester before him, and we were soon at a point opposite Jackson where we had the good luck to find a canoe which we used in conveying the dead, wounded and a guard across the river.

It is impossible in a brief sketch of this character to detail all the thrilling events in which Dave Hill took an active part in the tragic drama of the Modoc war. Suffice it to say that during the interim, while Captain Jackson's command, disabled by the first fight, was unable to protect the settlements, and no other troops, either state or national were in reach, a few citizens, a small detachment of Indians from Yainax and 36 Klamaths under Chief Blowe and Dave Hill, held the Modocs at bay, protected the persons and property of settlers and gathered up the stricken victims of Modoc treachery from the sage plains of Tule lake, where they fell in the massacre of November 29, 1872. After the arrival of troops Dave was given a command of a detachment of 20 Klamath scouts, attached to the regular cavalry, and operated with Colonel Bernard, on the east side of the lava beds, during and subsequent to the investment of the stronghold, and rendered active and efficient service. The writer's company, which included 27 Indian scouts, was with General Wheaton, on the west.

In 1874 a company was organized in Boston, having in view the presentation upon the American stage of scenes representing Indian and frontier life; the conflict between settlers and Indians, and the eventual reign of peace between the races and the final acceptance of the Indian as a civilized man. The conception was a unique and original one and it was hoped the enterprise would pay its way, and perhaps more, while awakening new interest in the cause of the Indian throughout the country. As far as possible the actors were to be characters who had participated in such scenes on the border as it was the intention to present.

James Ridpath, the well-known author and humanitarian, was to be the manager; Major C. B. Raymond, treasurer; Colonel A. B. Meacher, lecturer, and the writer was engaged to take charge of the Indians; to attend to the dramatic part of the program, and to translate the speeches of the Indians.

Mr. Meachman selected Frank Toby (Winemar) and Jeff Riddle from the Klamath country; George Harney, wife and child from Siletz agency, and Scar Faced Charley, Steamboat Frank and Shacknasty Jim from the Indian Territory. The writer selected Dave Hill and his faithful friend, Tecumseh, from the Klamath reservation. The company met Mr. Ridpath at St. Joseph, Missouri, and began its career at that point as "Ridpath's Modoc Lecture Company." It subsequently appeared at Jefferson City, St. Louis, Terre Haute, Louisville, Covington, Washington, Philadelphia, Morristown, Reading, Camden, Trenton, Elizabeth, Jersey City, Newark and repeatedly in New York City. In Washington the company was delayed for some time on account of the illness of Harney's wife. During that time, however, we appeared several times at the National Theatre, called on President Grant at the White House; visited the capital and other places of interest and interviewed the Commission of Indian Affairs in regard to the welfare of the Klamath agency.

Dave was a natural orator, made a fine appearance on the stage and became very popular. Some of his speeches were models of their kind. Surrounded by mementoes of American liberty and with the portraits of the fathers of the republic looking down from the walls, he made a speech in old Independence Hall, Philadelphia, a stirring appeal for Indian civilization and eventual citizenship—which was greatly appreciated.

In New York and Brooklyn considerable interest was awakened, and finally Peter Cooper tendered the use of Cooper Union for a grand mass meeting in the interest of these people, to be addressed by our company. So far the company had not been a financial success, and the Boston Bank, in which Major Raymond's capital was deposited had failed, but a successful issue of the Cooper Union meeting would, probably, give us such recognition as would likely open the way for final success. The writer was taken sick at the St. Charles hotel and on the very day the meeting was to occur at Cooper's Institute, Dave Hill mysteriously disappeared, having, evidently been kidnaped in the hope of a reward, as he was regarded as indispensable to the company.

The police were notified the same evening; detectives were employed and everything was done that seemed possible to discover his whereabouts, but without avail. Two or three weeks were spent in the search. The Indians were disheartened. The organization was reluctantly abandoned. The Modocs were sent without escort to the Indian Territory, and the writer, with George Harney, the Rogue River chief, and family, and the disconsolate Tecumseh, returned to Oregon.

Two months and a half later, Dave Hill, footsore and travel worn, arrived among his people who rejoiced as one risen from the dead, and narrated the story of his strange experience. Of how two men representing themselves to be Christians and his friends, enticed him away from the hotel; full of information about his people and his own career; they told him he had been accused of treachery in the lava beds, secretly tried and a scaffold erected for his execution. While insisting upon the truth of this bewildering story, they had taken him into a covered vehicle and had driven about the city until night was at hand and he had entirely lost his bearings. They kept him constantly under guard in a cellar for several days. Then one night they took him on to a train and to a small town in the country, where he was concealed for some time, when he was returned to the same cellar in the city. This was, probably, during the time that negotiations for a reward were going on.

Finally, no doubt fearing detection, one of his guardians escorted him to the train at night, accompanied him as far as Cincinnati, gave him $40 in money and gave him Godspeed for his journey homeward.

In the overthrow of the hereditary chieftainship of the Klamaths, in 1868, by the reduction of La Lakes and the elevation of Allen David according to democratic principles; in the emancipation of Pit river slaves held by the Klamaths; in the opening of the Modoc Point road in 1870; in the settlement of prospective trouble with the Snakes in 1873; in the liberation of the people from the domination of unprincipled medicine men; in the prompt execution of the few murderers known to the Klamath agency, history since the treaty of 1864; in the improvement of morals, opening of schools and farms; in the settlements of disputes and in the efficient work of the police force, Dave exercised great influence.

Brave, honest, enthusiastic, he was the champion of the white man's civilization among his people, and his influence was of inestimable value in maintaining peaceable relations between the whites and Indians. Few people in the Klamath basin realized how much gratitude was due to Dave Hill; for the pioneer settlements knew no defender more ready, fearless and sincere. The writer who saw him tried on many occasions of peril, knew well the worth of this man, and hoped he would live to realize the gratitude that was his due for the honorable part he performed in the struggles of the early days, but a cruel fate decreed otherwise.

CHIEF HENRY BLOWE.

In May, 1904, W. W. Nickerson wrote as follows concerning Chief Henry Blowe, one of the best known Indians who helped make history in the Klamath country:

At his home on Williamson river, on the Klamath reservation, died ex-chief Henry Blowe, on the morning of May 17, 1904. It is only just that the record of this noted man should be mentioned through the public journals, I think, for no man took a more honorable part as a leader of his people during the darkest days in the history of the early settlement of the Klamath country, and as a fast and forceful friend of our government. He was one of the signers of the great treaty of October 14, 1864, was a scout with the United States troops during the Paiute war; was with Hill as his associate at the head of a detachment of Klamath Indians, 36 strong, as a guard to the settlements immediately following the outbreak of 1872 until the arrival of troops sufficient to make the country practically safe. In 1869 he was chosen second chief among the reservation tribes, and subsequently, on the retirement of High Chief, Allen David, became his successor.

In the organization of the mounted police force he became its captain and was for many years a most efficient factor in the work of this executive arm of the agency administration. In all of his official work, either as a chief in his tribe, as a judge of the court of Indian offenses; as a policeman, or in whatever capacity he was called upon to serve, he was a safe and conservative, though forceful leader of his people, as well as an unswerving friend to the government and a strong, right arm of the agency authority. * * *

At the time of Blowe's death he was about 76 years of age. All his children have preceded him to the great beyond, and of the 26 chiefs who signed the great treaty of 1864 with the tribes of southeastern Oregon, only Allen David and Lelu and Charley Preston, the official interpreter, now old and feeble, remain.

STORIES OF THE RANGE.

Paul DeLaney, who has written many interesting things, fictitious and historical, of the Southern Oregon country, has penned the following relative to some of the landmarks of Lake county:

"Interior Oregon, that is, the isolated portion, contains many interesting landmarks that are familiar to the stockman of that section, and which will later be regarded as a part of the most interesting history of that wonderful country. These landmarks are far apart, and in traveling through the country one always finds it necessary to cover the distance between two of them every day. They are usually watering places, and it takes a hard day's travel from one to another in most cases and in some cases it requires travel deep into the night. They stand out in the great Oregon 'desert' like the beacon lights and guiding points to the mariner at sea. The stockman or traveler who does not know the landmarks of the Oregon range is in as much danger as the pilot at sea who is ignorant of the charts and maps of the country he is in.

"One of the most interesting of these is Ram's Peak or Wagontire Mountain. It is marked on the maps as Ram's Peak, but few stockmen know it by that name. They all speak of it as Wagontire, and this name carries with it a great deal of speculation on the part of those who hear the story, and the story is a romantic one, too. This mountain is situated near the Harney and Lake county line. It is supposed to be geographically in the center of the desert. A large creek flows from its foothills and a number of springs boil out from its base.

It is thirty to fifty miles from this point in any direction to other water. The water from the creek and springs flows out into the plains and is drunk up by the dry sands. But along their channel and for many acres distant the moisture causes vegetation to spring forth like a well cultivated garden and all wild vegetation always grew here, and now a few hardy ranchers have settled at the place and have fine meadows, and some are beginning to raise vegetables and fruits. Ram's Peak was formerly a great game country, and also a great rendezvous for the Indians. When the latter were hard pressed by the early day Indian fighters they would hie themselves across the desert and take refuge in the foothills where game and water and grass were plentiful, while a lookout from the peak could observe the approach of the enemy.

"Deer, antelope, elk and smaller game were as plentiful as horses and cattle are now; in fact there is scarcely a day of the present time that the antelope do not visit fields of fresh grass. The settlers sit in their houses and watch them graze among their cattle and horses as a sort of way of breaking the monotony of the isolated and lonely section, where a stranger is sometimes not seen for months.

"It is claimed that the name on the map originated from the fact that in early days there were hundreds of wild sheep on the mountain; that these animals came down into the meadows occasionally and when hard pressed would climb up among the peaks and look out from the overhanging rocks and ledges at the enemy and stamp their feet with all of the known impudence of the mountain sheep when once out of danger. There are old timers yet who still remember when an old ram stood guard on the highest peak, and they claim that the name of the mountain originated from this particular ram.

"But the name of Wagontire originated from another cause, and no one who roams the plains will permit it to be called anything else. In early days a large pile of old, worn out wagon tires were found near a spring at the foot of the mountain. A trail led across the desert at this place and it was naturally presumed that an emigrant train had found its way to this point. But no person has ever been able to explain how or why the old tires were placed there. The mystery about the matter lends importance to it, and for all these years there has been all kinds of speculation about the wagon tires.

"There are those who think that an emigrant train wandered this way in the early days and that the Indians attacked it and massacred the immigrants and destroyed their wagons and took away their animals and property. They think that they burned the wagons in a heap and for that reason the tires were found in a pile. But this theory is offset by the argument that no skeletons were ever found at the place, and that had there been murder committed these evidences would have remained undestroyed. But there are those who argue that some member escaped and afterwards returned and buried the bones of the deceased, or that other immigrants may have performed this act of charity later, and that there may have been a massacre after all.

"The theory of the famous Blue Bucket mine is also interwoven with the story of the place, and there are those who are positive that buckets full of gold nuggets are lying idle in some of the gulches of the mountain. It is well known that a woman, the member of some immigrant train in early days, somewhere in Oregon, Idaho or Northern California, discovered the Blue Bucket mine, and that it has never since been actually located. People of all these places know 'about' where it is. The well known story is that the immigrant train was in camp and that they were exhausted and dying of thirst. Each member of the firm took a bucket or pail, or whatever he or she could get, and all started out in different directions to search for water. After many hours a woman of the party returned with a bucket of water—it was an old blue bucket—and she had in a pocket of her dress a handful of little curios that had attracted her attention. She exhibited them, stating that she had found them in a stream where she procured water. Upon examination they were found to be gold nuggets, ranging from the size of partridge eggs down. 'Why, I could have picked up this bucketful,' said the woman, and this gave the mine the name.

"A death occurred in the party as a result from the exposure and after burying her—it was the woman who found the mine—they searched for a few days for the mine and moved on. Members of the party afterwards returned and searched for the mine, but they were unable to find it. Other persons have been searching for it ever since. Every watering place and every gulch from Idaho to California bear evidence of being the place where the Blue Bucket mine was discovered, and no one will be surprised at finding it any time.

"Wagontire, the people of that section claim, was surely the place. They say it is perfectly reasonable that there were immigrants there or the wagontires would not have been there. They say that Indians may have massacred the immigrants and that that is a good reason why the mine was never found. Then there are those who say it is perfectly reasonable that the immigrants were the ones who discovered the mine for the reason that if they were not massacred by the Indians they stopped there and repaired their wagons, and while the men were doing this the women went out and discovered the mine. Anyway, no one has ever been able to shake any of these respective communities on their theory of the mine, and in spite of the official name on the map, of Ram's Peak, the people of the interior will always call it Wagontire.

"Almost due south from Wagontire, at a distance of about fifty miles, is another landmark with a name given it at a more recent date, which is equally as interesting to stockmen. This place is Horseshoe Spring. A sluggish spring seeps out from the base of Juniper mountain and fills a few holes about the place where cattle and horses come for miles to exhaust the water daily and lick the damp ground where the water had formerly stood. A large area around this spring is covered with old horseshoes and bleached bones of horses. This is a great mystery to the stockman who does not know the story. It is well known that the horses of the desert were never shod, and why these piles of bones and hundreds of horseshoes should be found at this faraway and isolated place is a puzzler to them. Anyway, these horseshoes were the cause of the naming of the spring.

"In the early days a Californian was traveling through Oregon looking for a location for a stock ranch. He saw this spring and thought that if it was properly protected the point would make a good one for his stock ranch. He accordingly hired men and hauled wire and posts several hundred miles to the place and erected a fence about the spring, taking in all of the meadow adjacent to the spring. This meadow was fine and the water was ample when protected from the stock generally, and he brought several hundred fine horses from California to the place. He left a man in charge and returned to his home.

"As fall approached the representative of the Californian decided to come out for winter supplies. He had to come more than a hundred miles, and while he was out winter came on, which comes on suddenly in that country. The snow followed, and it was unusually severe. The herder was delayed several weeks in getting back to the ranch, and when he finally reached it he found that the snow had drifted many feet high all over the fenced portion, completely covering up the band of horses. They had all either starved or frozen to death, and this accounts for the bones and horseshoes at Horseshoe Spring."

A RELIC OF EARLY DAYS.

Ever since the days of the early settlement of Lake county, up to a couple of years ago, travelers in the vicinity of Abert lake saw, not far from the shore, portions of a wagon projecting from the waters of that lake. Various opinions have been rife as to how that wagon got into the lake, one of them being that sometime in the distant past a venturesome traveler attempted to drive across the lake on the ice and broke through. The most probably theory is, perhaps, that before the early settlement of Lake county, a band of immigrants with their train of wagons passed through this country and were killed by Indians. The train was probably on the top of the rim, overlooking the lake, when the murders were committed, and the wagon was rolled down into the water by the savages.

The east side of Abert lake is too rough for wagons to go clear around, and another theory is advanced that immigrants, who had wandered off the regular route of travel, had attempted to go that way, and finding it impossible, they abandoned their wagons. Years ago, it is said, other portions of wagons were found on the shore of the lake, and in recent years a tar bucket, such as was carried by all the early day immigrants, was discovered in the same vicinity. Great interest has been aroused in those historically inclined in the solution of this unexplainable mystery, but so far nothing authentic has been learned that would tend to solve it.

In the fall of 1903 the wagon was hauled out of its long abiding place in Abert lake. Contrary to expectations, there were only two wheels and the hind axle of the wagon, instead of the complete wagon as was always supposed. It was an old fashioned thimble skein, with nuts to hold the wheels on, and not a lynch pin as was supposed. The action of the alkali water from years standing submerged nearly ate into the center of the wood parts, and the tires were rusted in two.

DEATH ON THE DESERT.

Leading out from a great basin, surrounded by an irregular border of mountains and rim-rocks, near the east boundary line of Lake county, is a deep canyon which leads out in a zig-zag course to another plain, writes Paul DeLaney in one of his stories of the Eastern Oregon country. There are many canyons leading out from this basin, but this one is the most noted by reason of the history which gave it its name. The basin covers many thousand acres of ground and upon approaching it in summer from a distance it looks like a vast snow field. The traveler knows that cannot be true, for the thermometer rises far above one hundred degrees in the shade, when a shade can be found. It might be called the "death valley" of Oregon but for one redeeming feature.

In spite of the alkali that lies deep upon the surface and blinds the eyes during the summer wind storms, giving the whole country the appearance of snow banks in the distance and the appearance of vast lime kilns at a nearer approach, water can be found here. Near the center of the plain a large spring of pure water boils forth and is drunk up by the alkali dust, but not until it has flowed some distance formed a small lake, which is designated on the map as "Alkali." It is after the death of a man for whom the canyon was named, whose remains were found a few miles from the place, after a fearful death from starvation and thirst.

Mr. Vernator, of Lakeview, which is about 75 miles from Alkali, started alone on horseback into the region in search of horses that had wandered away. After he was absent many days his friends became alarmed and went in search of him. Large rewards were offered for his discovery, as he was wealthy and the head of an influential family. After many days the horse he had ridden was found near the spring in the center of the alkali beds, browsing on the runty, dry grass. The saddle was still on the animal and a fragment of rope about its neck showed that it had broken loose from some place at which it had been tied.

The back trail of the horse into the mouth of the canyon is many miles distant. Here the other fragment of the rope was found tied to a juniper bush, which told a story. The horse had been tied there, and when the biting pangs of hunger and thirst could be endured no longer, it had thrown its strength against the rope, broken it and made it way to grass and water with animal instinct.

The search was then renewed for the lost man. Finally his tracks were found leading along the foot of the rim-rocks, at first, and afterwards leading out into mid-desert. Then they found where he had paused and walked about in a circle. Then the trail led out again in another direction, the feet having sunk to their ankles in the soft alkali sands.

Then they came to holes dug in the heated soil at intervals along the trail. They ranged in depth from six inches to two feet, and the marks showed that it had been done by means of a pocket knife and the naked hands.

They at last came upon his body, which showed that he had died an agonizing death. He had removed one of his boots and placed it under his head. He still clasped his pocket knife, and by his side there was a deep hole, which he had dug in his delirium, doubtless imagining that he might obtain water in this way. Irregular marks of the last knife stabs were still visible about the hole he had dug, which showed that to the last breath he had vainly plied the instrument. Since that time the canyon has borne his name.

RELIC OF THE STONE AGE.

In 1884 Dr. Oglesby, of Fossil, brought into that place a beautiful Indian relic which he had found imbedded in the roots of a fir tree near Mary's Peak. This tree, or rather the remains of a tree, was about three hundred years old, and so far advanced in decay was the trunk that it could be easily kicked to pieces. The relic resembles the blade of a huge knife, 18 inches in length, three inches in width and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inches thick. It is cut out of brown granite, and has an exceedingly high polish, being nearly as smooth as dressed marble. This, it is quite evident, is a relic of the Stone Age, although it has been claimed by scientists that implements of this description have never been found north of Mexico.

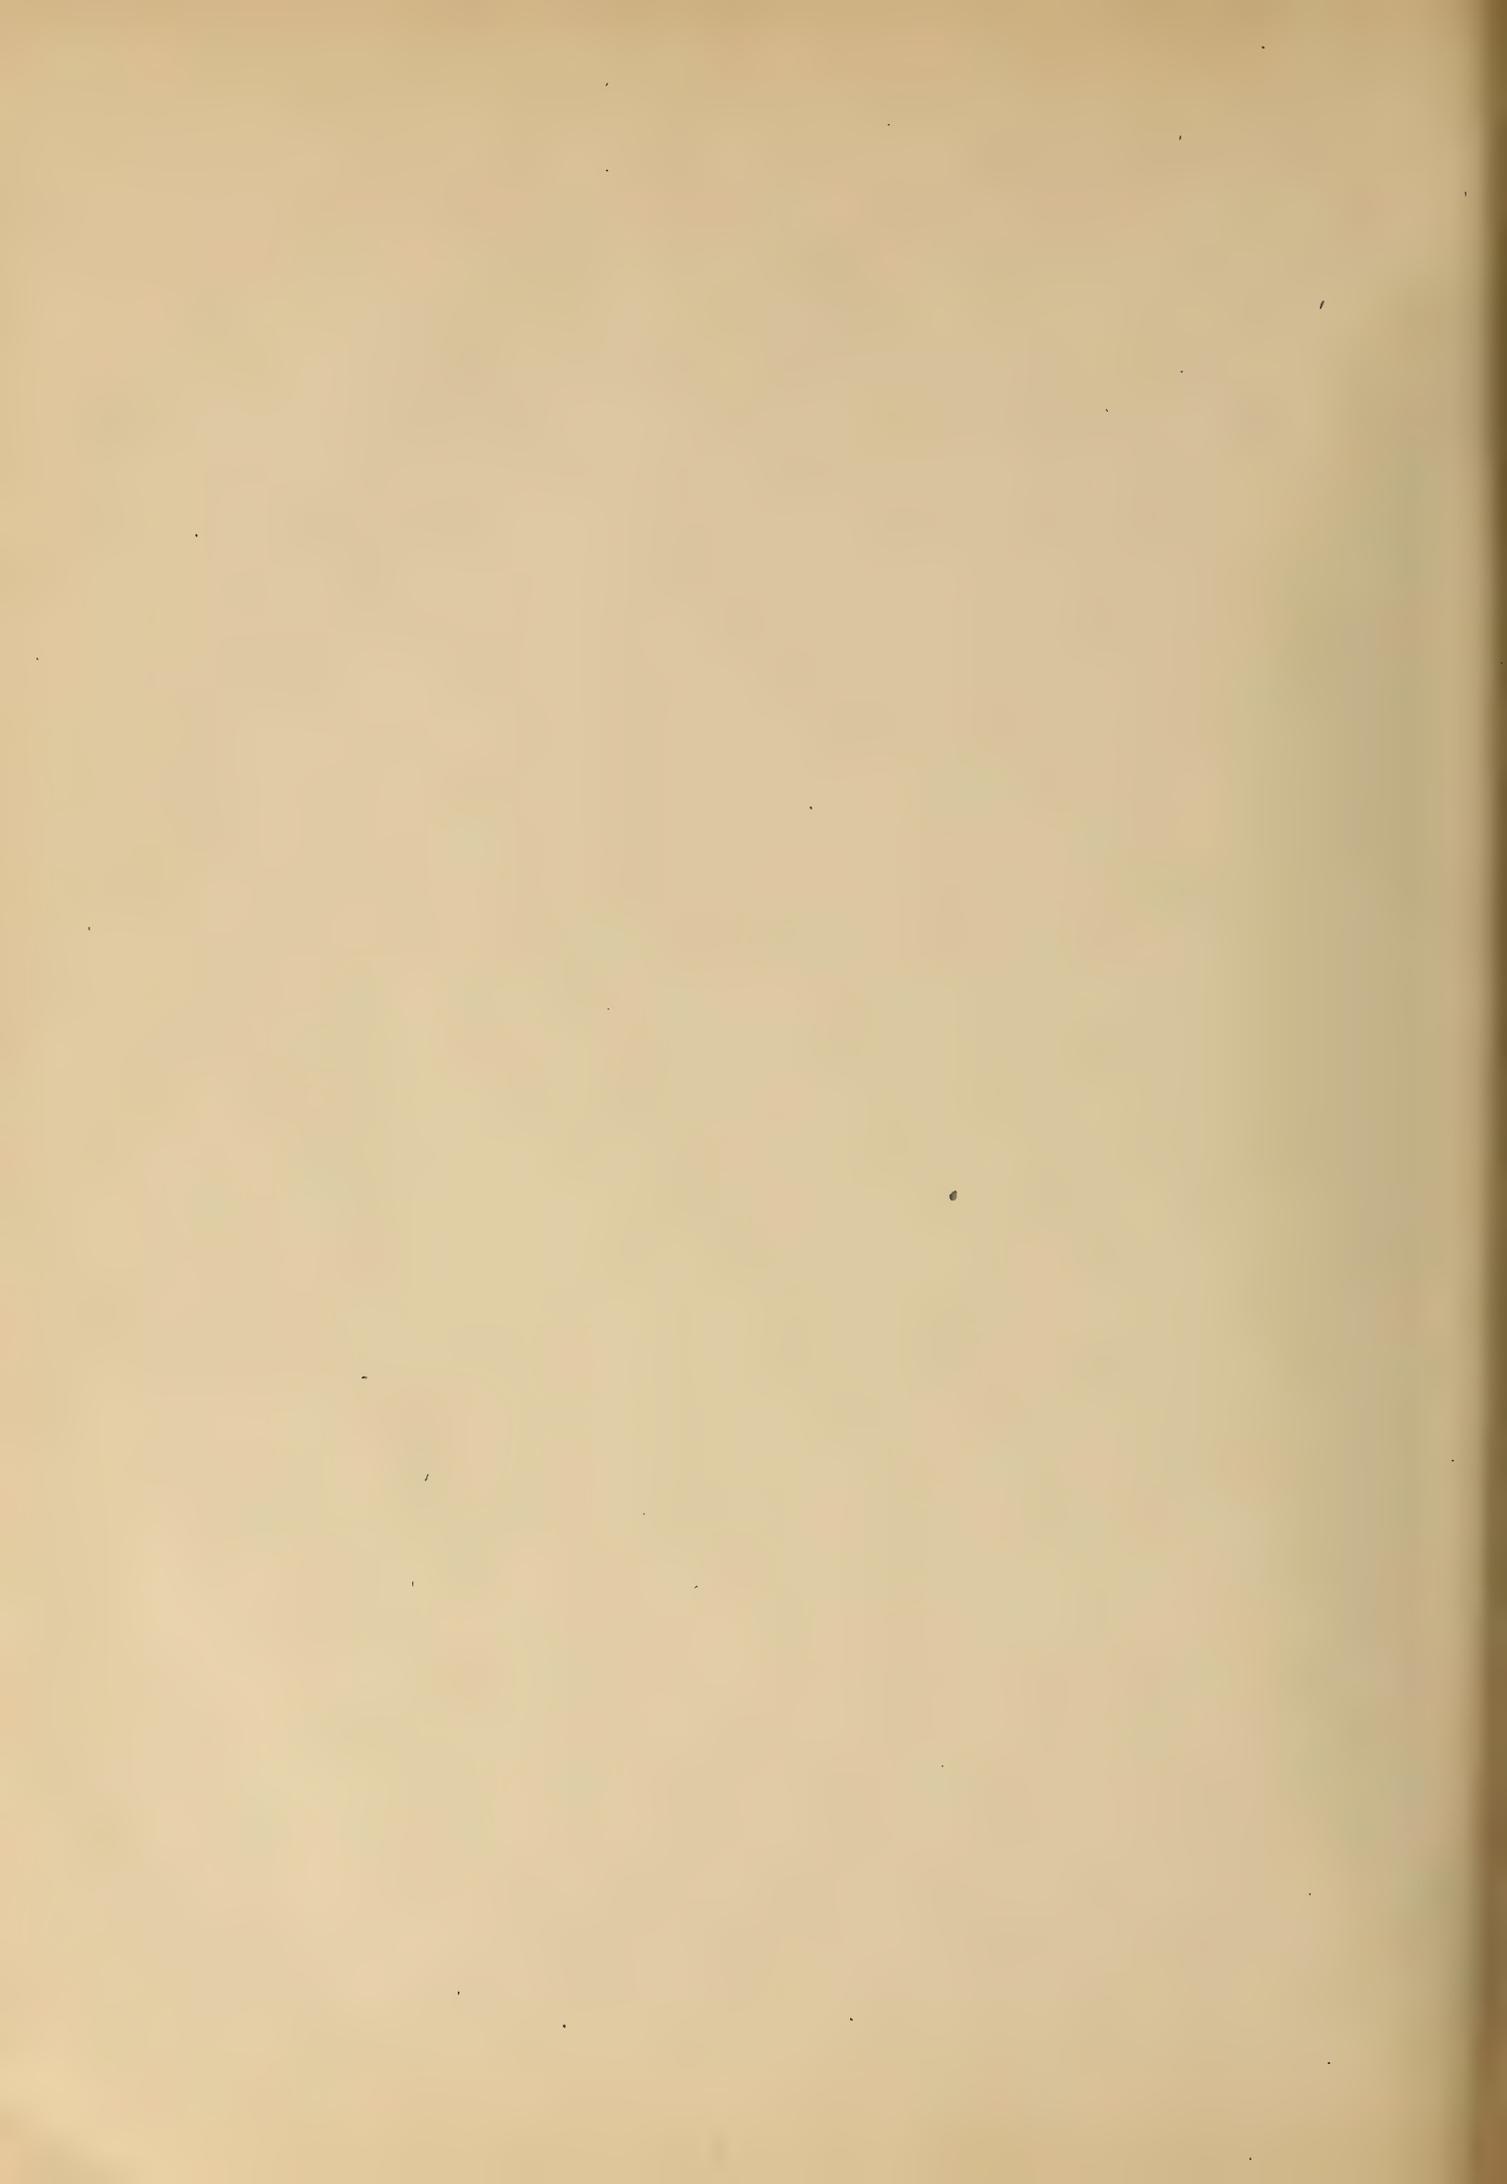

Dr. Oglesby came to the coast in 1853, and during those pioneer days became intimately acquainted with a certain Indian chief. This acquaintance ripened into friendship. At one time the old chief was attacked by a vicious grizzly bear. Dr. Oglesby went to his aid, killed the animal and saved the chief's life. The latter was conversant with the traditions of his tribe and he related to the doctor a legend which had been handed down from father to son for ages. It was to the effect that at one time a people came from the ocean armed with big stone knives, and while the local Indians slept peacefully in their wigwams these ferocious invaders would attack and murder them. It is the belief of the doctor that this stone instrument is one of the knives described by the old chief.
